On the face of it this seems to be a realistic compromise. It does not permit a particular class of students to "double count" units but does reduce the bias against students whose Programs would be incomplete without units which are, incidentally, required. There is the objection that students may make use of this provision to include required units for which they received good grades, by revising their Program of Emphasis to include those units after they have taken them. This is indeed a possibility. Yet there has always been the possibility that students would revise their Programs to include units which were originally electives. All this means is that rationales for Programs of Emphasis revision must be considered closely, not merely rubber-stamped.

There is, however, a more serious objection to the proposal. It concerns the precedent set by allowing the Program of Emphasis to be extended beyond fifteen units in special circumstances. As has been mentioned before, curriculum requirements are reciprocal obligations: they impose limitations upon the Faculty as well as students. The requirement that fifteen units be included in Program of Emphasis does not merely mean that students must justify the inclusion of at least this many units. It also means that a faculty advisor cannot require a student to include more than fifteen units before his Program will be approved. Although it is not obvious that the above mentioned proposal would be used directly for this purpose, the mere recognition of the possible extension of the Program of Emphasis weakens one of the fundamental protections a student has from over-zealous faculty. If it became accepted that students could include more than fifteen units in their Program, it could expose them to pressure to do so. It would be unfortunate if this proposal were adopted without the realization that it could be used to undermine the essential freedom of the New Curriculum.

Juniata Receives Ridenour Bequest

President John N. Stauffer announced today that Juniata College has received a $5,000 bequest from the estate of Edna B. Ridenour, Hagerstown, Md.

The bequest will be used to establish the "M. Brayden and Edna B. Ridenour Scholarship."

The recipients of the award will be selected in accordance with the following preferences as prescribed in the Ridenour will:

(1) A member of the Hagerstown Church of the Brethren, who is a resident of Washington County, Maryland;

(2) A resident of the state of Maryland; or

(3) Such other person as may be worthy of said scholarship.

In accepting the gift, Dr. Stauffer remarked, "In a time when the costs of a college education place an increasing burden upon individual students and private colleges, such as Juniata, it is necessary that the amount of money available through scholarships and other financial grants be constantly increased. Mrs. Ridenour's bequest contributes to this effort; it is an expression of confidence in the value of small, private, liberal arts colleges."

Eat of the Needle

by Bob Kraut

Around this festive time of the year it has become customary for most record companies to release a plethora of new albums in a colossal effort to part the zealous holiday shopper from his newly acquired wealth. This ploy is almost as old as Christmas itself, and with regard to buying these LP's, two Latin words should suffice — 'caveat emptor' (let the buyer beware!). To avoid accumulating what may eventually become a lot of superficial music I recommend using these recent riches to build a record collection with rock of only the most time-tested material. So, for the discriminating Christmas shopper I have compiled a discography comprising the most pervasive influences on the idiom in the last decade. Conspicuous by their absence from the list are a great many of rock-doms biggest names, who though immensely popular with the masses have failed to produce music of any significant or lasting value. Included are a number of "Greatest Hits" albums. It should be noted that only in the last five or six years have record companies learned how to manufacture worthwhile rock LP's, so while excellent, and often superior, singles were released by, for example, the Motown labels, many of their albums contained schmaltzy remakes of show tunes or undistinguished filler. With the arrival of Marvin Gaye's magnificent "What's Going On" it appears all that has changed, but once again only the prime determinant — time — will tell. I have added a few new releases that have managed, in only a short time, to re-shape the boundaries of our music, but generally speaking, the list is made up of older forces. Have a nice vacation, but beware of "those ol' album pushin', special-priced holiday blues". Hallelujah!

Is It What It Should Be ?

Pro—Con: L. A. Beeghly Library

As we stare out the window on a cold, dreary Juniata afternoon, we watch the parade in and out of L. A. Beeghly Library. Some of the students smile; some of them, however, do not smile. Obviously those who are not smiling do not like something about the library.

"It's just like a country club; all they have to do is serve drinks and they would be set," utters Tim Jablonski. Or in the phrasing of Steve Glass, "There lighting is poor, and there's so much noise it's nothing but a huge social party."

So it seems there are people who want to put partying where it belongs — back in the dorms. Further complaints were offered by Natalie West: "We freshmen were stumped when we went to do our research paper, because the library material was pretty inadequate. However, the people who worked there were helpful."

Sue Hockenberry echoed these sentiments with "There are not enough books. I can never find the books pertaining to what I'm attempting to discuss (even though book to student ratio is good). I also feel the card catalogue isn't as well organized at it could be—for instance, under the Library of Congress style of organization."

Supervisor of the circulation desk, George Drobnock, feels that "the student assistants are too apathetic, working only for their $1.60 an hour." Also, the periodicals are too spread out, and the reason so many of them are swiped is that they can't be checked out.

Director of Libraries, Anne Catlin, senses a need for some changes but feels the existing structure could serve the students if utilized properly: "No library has everything that it wants. There are 20-25,000 new volumes being published every year. We have to be selective. Our college library cooperative programs allow us to extend the library service. Students, especially the Freshmen, don't know how the library works. Many times materials are stolen and destroyed.

"As far as the noise is concerned, students should control the noise level. The only way for the library to work is for the students to make it work. The librarians are not there as enforcement officers.

"The work is very hard, trying to get the books and periodicals needed, and it is little appreciated by the students. At the present we have an inadequate staff, but increasing it is beyond our finances."

In closing the column down for the vacation, we of the Pro-Con staff would like to thank the students, professors, and college staff for their comments and suggestions. We have been criticized by some for failing to raise relevant issues, and our only answer is: we need help from people concerned about Juniata to make this column what it could be. Please send any suggestions, comments, criticisms, and especially ideas for future topics to Pro and Con, Box 667.

Conservationists, some scientists and some legislators contend that there are alternatives to the building of nuclear power plants, but claim they are not being explored. In a special report in the December SCIENCE DIGEST, these alternatives — hydroelectric power, sunpower, harnessing the tides, geothermal power — are all explained. The Atomic Energy Commission and the utility companies defend the construction of more nuclear plants while other groups decry their danger and ask for studies of other ways to meet growing power needs before we find ourselves with more nuclear power than we can safely handle.

GSA Discusses Environmental Problems

by Bob Washburn

I would like to share with the campus community a few of the highlights of the Geological Society of America's annual meetings which Dr. Trexler and I attended in Washington, D.C. November 1-3.

The largest number of geologists in GSA's 84 year history (4300) turned out for the sessions. About a fourth were students. There were six sessions dealing directly with the environmental concerns of earth scientists. Of these sessions three lasted all day and three were half-day affairs. The high point of these was the symposium "Earth Sciences and the Environmental Challenge". To give you some idea of the importance and interest in this symposium— The morning session was chaired by the current President of the Society, the afternoon session by the President-elect of the Society and well over 100 attended the presentations. The keynote speaker was Congressman Paul McCloskey of California who talked on "Politics and the Environment". Central to his talk and succeeding talks was the theme—geologists get off your duffs—educate the public, the Congress and all law making bodies to the processes and hazards of our physical environment. The issues were made clear: (1) Public (incl. Congress) versus private (incl. executive) possession of the "facts", (2) The inadequacy of the property tax base to attack local environmental problems, (3) The time lag, now 10 to 15 years between awareness of national problems and implementation of the solutions. The crowd listened intently to all the participants and responded to McCloskey with a standing ovation. Certainly this does not represent a radicalization of a professional organization, but it does represent an increasing awareness of individuals of a public or social responsibility.

Other highlights that might interest you: Steve Herr, Juniata class of '67, now a graduate student of the University of Iowa was the only student to be invited to present a research paper at the meeting. His paper titled "Morphologic Investigation of Graptoloids from the Upper Ordovician Maquoketa Formation of Iowa with emphasis on regeneration and growth abnormilities" was excellent and only slightly longer than its title. Some of you heard Marshall Kay give a lecture or two on campus last spring on Continental Drift. Professor Kay was awarded the Penrose Medal—the highest award given by the Society.

It was an outstanding convention.

The Good Ole Days

The following article appeared in the March 18, 1949 issue of The Juniatian. A national survey of college graduates revealed these results that would have also typified the after-college life of Juniata students.

Your Future: Two Kind and $4.500

You will become a professional man or an executive with a salary of about $4,500 a year.

You will own your own home which will have a monthly rental value of $84. You will marry only once and will not become divorced. You will plan to have three children but will probably have only two.

You will read most of the best sellers, both fiction and non-fiction. You will also read from one to four magazines, concentrating on the "Readers' Digest," "Life," and the "Saturday Evening Post."

You will attend church fairly regularly and belong to about three other organizations. But the other organizations will have to do without you at about half of their meetings.

Politics

You will engage in about five political activities which includes reading about politics in newspapers and magazines and discussing it with your friends you will keep up with local civic activities and take an active part in the civic affairs of your community. You will also keep up with national and international developments, but your active status in politics will probably be confined to voting.

Interestingly enough, you will not arbitrarily identify yourself with any political party but will vote according to the issue in any given election.

No Night Clubbing

You will have only slightly less than four hours a day to spend in spare time activities. Most of that time will be taken up by reading or visiting friends. You will rarely ever go to a night club for entertainment.

In the matter of attitudes, you will believe that personal integrity of conduct and continuous searching for truth are the most important goals in life, and you will believe less and less that the greatest satisfaction in life comes from financial success, influence, or prestige.

Less Conservative

You will become more liberal than you were in college. You will believe that all Americans should have equal opportunity in social, economic, and political affairs. And you won't agree that children of minority groups or other races should play among themselves.

Reflect...

they self-extinguish and settle like scum on the surface of the celluloid cesspool. One diverts one's, for, after all, it was something that once was human, and, being human, was heir to the desire to be something more. Andy Warhol is a photographer who takes living flesh pictures of Souls who inhabit the public hells of our Society, a rogues gallery of spiritual depravity.

Dennis Hopper can look and want to touch the hem of this sort of latter-day anti-Christ, but at best, he is just an observer. During one interesting scene (he has dream-wished into reality the All American Fantasy Dream) he is surrounded by a dozen or twenty assorted 'Warholian Groupie Type Girlies' and does a pathetic touchy-feely and makes the definitive masculine Stud revelation (ah, come on, Dennis) . . . "I'd rather give a girl 'head' than ball her, hey! maybe I'm a lesbian, eh? . . . eh?" . . . No, Dennis, I don't think you are a lesbian. I don't think you're that honest. What I think is that you are a little boy, off somewhere, playing by/with yourself and dreaming away. Hopefully, not for what is to the rest of us The American Dream.

People, like Dennis Hopper, are shaping your future world. Take every opportunity to study them as carefully as you would give attention to a science project. It will arm you with behavioral knowledge.

A World of Weddings

Seeking a spouse? Where in the world to go?

Surprisingly, and despite frequent commentary to the contrary, you might try staying at home. The marriage rate in the United States has risen 26 percent in the last decade, according to a recently released study on international marriage trends by Metropolitan Life Insurance Company. Last year, the United States recorded 10.6 marriages per 1,000 population, compared to a record low of 8.4 in 1961, and now has the highest rate in the world.

Nevertheless, note Metropolitan Life's statisticians, although the United States ranks high, our neighbor to the north, Canada, might also be a good bet. In the past seven years alone, Canadian marriages increased more than 27 percent, with the annual number of marriages reaching new highs in each of the last three years.

Indeed, all of the English speaking countries around the world are reporting increases in marriage. Another example is Australia, which recorded a rise of 21.3 percent in the past decade.

Puerto Rico's marriage rate is also high, paralleling that of the United States and Canada—10.5 per 1,000 population, or a 15.4 percent increase.

European areas showed driverse marriage trends. According to Metropolitan Life, the marriage for the period between 1960-1964 and 1969 (or 1970 where available), increased in 10 countries, decreased in 11, and showed little change in Demark and Yugoslavia. A journey to the Netherlands, where the newlywed rate of increase is the highest in all of Europe—18.8 percent—might prove successful. Bulgaria, on the other hand, might be less promising, for it recorded the lowest rate of increase in all Ecrope—4.8 percent.

And trips to Romania and Sweden, where the rate of marriages decreased by 25.8 and 25.4 percent respectively, should probably be scratched from the itinerary entirely this year. Sweden reported the lowest rate of marriage in all of Europe last year—5.3 per 1,000 population compared with an annual average of 7.1 in 1960-64. The Soviet Union's current marriage rate of 9.7 per 1,000 population is the highest of any European nation, but represents only a slight upswing following several years of a downward trend there, the statisticians note.

As for the Middle East and Asia, only Israel and Japan have reported complete marriage statistics for the past 10 years. Israel's rate of increase—the highest of any country reviewed—is a startling 32.9 percent, while Japan's is a relatively low 3.1 percent, concluded Methropolitan Life's study.

Indians Still Winless

by Stew Kauffman

On Wednesday, December 8, the Juniata basketball team traveled to Federal City only to be handed their fourth straight loss of the season. Federal City, coached by the ex-Boston Celtic star, Sam Jones, topped the Indians by a score of 91 to 63. Coach Jack Swinderman said the team's poor shooting percentage from both the floor and the free throw line hurt the team. From the floor, Juniata shot a cold 27% compared to a warm 44% for Federal City. The Indians missed 15 lay-ups through the course of the game. Juniata was 27 for 45 for 60% from the charity stripe. Federal City has a slight edge in the rebounding category with 62 rebounds against Juniata's 52. Paul Valasek was the leading rebounder for the Indians with 23. Leading scorers for the Indians were Paul Valasek with 16, on Straley with 15, Tom Griffin with 9, and freshman Mark Jula with 10. Tom Rinaldi did not play due to injuries and sickness.

Juniata Skiing Trips Planned

O.K. all you skiers where's the snow? Well the Sports and Game Committee of Center Board is planning to find it this season in a big way. Next semester the committee is sponsering a number of excursions to Blue Knob Ski Resort, similar to but more frequent than last years program. Hopes are high for six such skiing trips at approximately the cost of $6.50 per person each trip. This expense will cover the transportation to and from the lodge, cost of renting equipment and lift ticket for the slopes. For those who have their own equipment the cost will be around $3.50 per trip. Package deals will also be offered that will cut the cost even more for the true ski freaks that want to make all six trips. Later in the semester a week-end skiing retreat to the slopes of upper New York is being planned for those who would like to enjoy some true snow fun. Infomation concerning the Blue Knob and week-end excursions may be obtained at the information desk in Ellis Hall. The success of the program will hinge on your participation so come find the snow with us —Ski Juniata.

Awareness is Crucial to Police - College Relations

by Jeff A. Naugle

Each year the crime rate increases noticeably and along with it the price of fighting these crimes. The Federal government alone appropriated three-quarters of a billion dollars for the prevention of crime last year. As these indices increase, so does the attention directed toward the role of the police officer. The concepts of police work and the techniques for controlling crime are constantly changing. The demands upon the police officer are forming a back breaking load due to the lack of support from the largest police service patron, the public. Often the lack of support is due to a misunderstanding, fear, or a lack of interest in the person who is the citizen's first line of defense against crime, the policeman.

The following information was gathered during an interview with the Huntingdon Borough Police Chief, Donald Wingate. The interview was made in order that Juniata students might be more aware of the procedures and problems which confront the Huntingdon Borough Police.

Huntingdon has a police force consisting of eight regular men. They are the Chief, Donald Wingate; a sergeant, John Cummins; and five patrolmen, Cholmer Coy, Frank Burlia, Wilbur Harris, Edward Mesrills, and Willis Albert Sneath. Currently the department is short one man due to the recent resignation of Patrolman Robert Edmundson. The force provides twenty-four hour service, or three eight hour shifts, with two men on duty the majority of the time. During the daylight working hours, the Chief is usually on duty. He often pulls special duty at times during the night. The department sometimes experiences difficulty in keeping two men on patrol during vacations, periods of illness, or when an officer resigns or is suspended. The men patrol in two radio dispatched cars and occassionally go on foot patrol with walkie-talkie. They also handle meter patrol during the hours the meters are in operation.

To qualify for a policeman in Huntingdon, the applicant must be twenty-one years of age, have at least a high school diploma, and be in good health. Then he must pass a civil service exam. Once the potential officer is decided upon, he is sent to a preservice training program, directel by the Pennsylvania State Police, which lasts for twelve weeks. If this schooling is successfully completed, he begins his six month probationary period of on the job training under senior officers of the force. In order to further the officer's training and help him keep abreast of the latest techniques and happenings in police work, the department tries to sponsor two FBI schools a year and send men for training in additional State Police courses aimed at training municipal police forces.

The Huntingdon Police Department is not specialized to the degree that the larger city police departments are. Therefore, each officer must possess the basic fundamentals of all police work. Most of the training is new. It was not required a few years ago, but now it is a necessity.

A policeman can make an arrest a number of ways: by stopping the offender and issuing a citation; or on a bench warrant. For traffic violations, the offender receives a copy of the citation on the scene. He may pay the fine in the designated time or request a hearing.

In the case of a misdemeanor, if the officer witnesses the offense, he may arrest on the spot, file a complaint, and set-up a hearing to decide the fine and cost, or he may refer the case to court. If the offense is not witnessed, a warrant may be issued for arrest when sufficient information is had from the investigation of the incident.

The procedure is almost identical for a felony; however, if the suspect is apprehended at the scene, he must be given his Miranda warning before any action is taken. From here the paths to justice are similar to those of a misdemeanor.

If an offender should resist arrest, the officer has the power to pursue as far as the next state line, if he so desires. Usually, if enough

Scott Leedy to Resign Juniatian Editorship

by Brian Maurer

Scott K. Leedy has announced his resignation as editor of Juniata's campus newspaper, the Juniatian. His resignation will go into effect some time in early February of this year.

When questioned as to the reasons behind his relinquishing his editorship, Leedy first replied that he felt he had fulfilled promises he had made last September to "get the college newspaper back on its feet and functioning again."

He also added: "Because my absence on campus next year is inevitable (Leedy is a senior), someone other than myself will have to assume the responsibilities of editor next fall. I believe that the present is as good a time as any to begin a gradual phasing-in of new staff personnel; these people will be taking leading roles in the future and need the experience now."

Leedy further elaborated that he felt the Juniatian has currently almost achieved its limit of maturity for the year. "The task of the new personnel will be to insure that the Juniatian will continue at the level of maturity at which it is now operating for the remainder of the semester. Next year the campus should experience a noticeable improvement in the paper. That future staff will have this year's Juniatian to use as a guideline and a reference point.

"I would like to say I have every bit of confidence at this time that the future staff personnel are entirely capable of assuming their responsibilities. I step down from my editorship with a clear conscience, knowing that the Juniatian will continue to be the newspaper that it has become."

Leedy had started thinking about accepting the position of editor of the college newspaper last Spring when he was approached by some faculty and administration members who requested that he consider the job. His first overt action toward assuming editorship was his attending the JC Leadership Conference in late August of last year. As Leedy put it: "I wanted to repay the college for something I thought I owed it." Since the publication of the first issue of the paper in late September, the campus has witnessed its growth from an awkward four-page potpourri to what it has become today.

Leedy had originally stated his intent to resign at "the last and only stated meeting of the 'Communications Board' " in mid December.

JC Chicago Alumni Sponsor Scholarship for 1971-72

Linda Sue Markey, a resident of Indianapolis, Ind., has been awarded the Juniata College Greater Chicago Alumni Club Sponsored Scholarship for the 1971-72 academic year.

In announcing the award, Dr. Paul Bechtel, professor of English at Wheaton College and president of the Greater Chicago Alumni Club, stated that the scholarship has been made available for the first time this year. It was established as a result of the high level of financial support received from the more than 150 Juniata College alumni who reside in the greater Chicago area.

A history major in her junior year at Juniata, Miss Markey has been a member of the church relations council and chairman of the special events committee of the student government. A graduate of Lawrence Central High School, she is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. David J. Markey, 5535 E. 46th St., Indianapolis.

Finnegan Foundation Offers Gov. Position

The 1972 Competition of the James A. Finnegan Fellowship Foundation will open on New Year's Day and close on Wednesday, March 1, 1972, it was announced in Harrisburg. Winners in this thirteenth annual competition, open to all Pennsylvania college students interested in governmental or political careers, will receive summer internships in governmental or political offices. Two principal awards will be made: one, the annual James A. Finnegan Award help in summer placement as governmental or political party trainees will be provided for other finalists.

Established in 1960 in memory of the late Secretary of the Commonwealth, James A. Finnegan, the Foundation has named two or more interns each year since, and has placed dozens of other student finalists in training positions during summer vacations. Winners in 1971 were: James A. Finnegan Award — Kaye Carson Kitlinski of Harrisburg — Timothy R. Bonner of North Braddock, a Junior at Drew University, Madison, New Jersey, and the following finalists: Joseph A. Esposito of Hazleton, a Junior at Pennsylvania State University, University Park; Joseph V. Brogan of Philadelphia, a Junior at LaSalle College, Philadelphia; Anthony J. Bosnick of Port Allegany, a Junior at Indiana University of Pennsylvania, Indiana, and Terri Lynne Zaluska of New Brighton, a Junior at Carnegie-Mellon University, Pittsburgh.

All entries must be on application forms provided by the Foundation and completed and returned before March 1, 1972. Information is required regarding grades and extra curricular activities, reference letters must be furnished, and two essays must be submitted. Requests for application forms should be sent immediately to the James A. Finnegan Fellowship Foundation, P.O. Box 314, Harrisburg, Pa. 17108.

Interpretations Class Presents Readings

by Mike Kamins

When rendered, efficaciously oral presentations can be dynamic and meaningful. The orator, through gesticulations and variance of tone, can effectively convey the nuances of the chosen work. The performer is not merely the reader of another's work, but an interpreter of that work who must be able to control or direct the reactions of his audience. I have concluded that oral performances have but two classifications: excellent and wretched. The final in the Fall Reading series, presented Jan. 5, vacillated between these poles.

The selections; which were performed by students from the Oral Interpretation of Drama class, were representative of Western literature. There were renditions from Sophocles, T. S. Eliot, Steinbeck, Johnson, Virginia Wolfe, and readings in black poetry. The diversity of the works was paralleled by the diversity of the performances. Some of the selections from Travels with Charlie were masterful while some of the other presentations actuated acute ennui. Even though the program lacked continuity the overall effect was palatable.

CANCELLATION

The Reading Hour program of the Fall Reading Festival originally scheduled for Wednesday, January 12, 1972, has been cancelled.

GRASS ROOTS

Compiled by Kim Hershberger and Donna Trelease

Each week, the Grass Roots staff selects, at random, the name of a Juniata student, and ask him to contribute an article, impromptu, concerning anything he chooses. What follows is the result of this week's chance soliciting:

by Lyn Shenton

I slid uphill to round-top and lay breathing on cold-frosted grass. Alone in the darkness, the round moon watched me, glittering on the frost crystalled blades nearest my head. The stars shined coldly down at me, independent as they were. All was still in black and white, in deep darkness and white reflections.

I wondered if perhaps I was like that: my eyes and surface actions glittering white light, my mind a deep, penetrating darkness. I looked up and around; and I saw that all the grass was coldly sparkling, as were hundreds of stars overhead. Yet they were merely pinpoints, focal points for our sensory perceptions. In between remained nothingness, something dark and mysterious.

Bending down again, I tried very hard to see these dark spots. It was like seeing the heavens through a telescope: more focal points were revealed, but in between there was always more darkness. I wanted very much to make an analogy. Why is grass dark between those fiery sparks of light? Why are the skies dark between the glimmer of many stars? What can reach this apparent nothingness? What secret might it contain for us?

I felt then that if ever this darkness could be understood, life's meaning would be disclosed. Reality would be discovered; the self would be revealed. Secrets would no longer be hidden; mysteries would be understood. There would be no more doubts and questions, no arguments. Humanity would reach its ultimate goal, society its utopia. But the grass would no longer glitter.

Youth Responsible for Changes in Selective Service

by Curtis W. Tarr

The agent for progress and improvement is participation. The Selective Service System has undergone many significant changes in the past two years. Many of the changes are directly attributable to the young men and women who participated responsibly during this difficult period of change.

Our chief mechanism for this youth involvement has been the Selective Service Youth Advisory Committees. Established in every state across the country, the groups have discussed the ideas, suggestions and criticisms of youth on a wide variety of draft topics.

The new draft law and regulations reflect nearly two dozen significant changes in the system. Of the thirty-six suggestions put forward by over 600 youth advisers, eighteen have been implemented by law or regulation. Six are being studied further for possible future implementation. Ten were beyond the jurisdictional control of the Selective Service System and were referred to the Executive Branch or Congress for consideration. Only two were disapproved.

One of the more important changes brought about concerned the age of local daft board members. The youth committees suggested lower ages and a curtailment of the length of service on local boards. Regulations previously stated that citizens could not be appointed to local boards unless they were at least 30 years old. They could not serve beyond their 75th birthday or for more than 25 years. The new regulations and law limit service on local draft boards to 20 years and set a maximum age of 65 years. A minimum age of 18 has been set for appointment to local boards.

In accord with our youth advisers' recommendations, the new law abolished student deferments for all college students who were not enrolled during the 1970-1971 academic year. In other words, from now on, no more college deferments will be granted. But the law also provides that both undergraduate and graduate students who receive induction orders will have their inductions postponed until the end of the school year, allowing him to graduate.

The advisers were concerned that draft calls varied from community to community, and they sought a more uniform approach to selecting men for service.

In the past a system based upon total registration was used to apportion the national draft call to the state headquarters, who in turn apportioned the call to individual local draft boards. The new regulations removed the requirement to use this system and instead established a uniform national call. Now all young men in the nation with the same lottery numbers who are available will receive induction notices at nearly the same time.

It was recommended that young men be afforded a judicial review of appeals to local and state boards in classification matters. The new law provides a realistic move in this direction, permitting a young man appealing his classification to bring witnesses and present his appeal to a quorum of the board. The young man also is allowed now to make a personal appearance before the Senate and Presidential appeal boards. Further, a registrant can require a board to give him a written explanation of its denial of his claim.

Among our advisers were conscientious objectors who believed that they should be provided an opportunity to work in jobs that better serve the national health, interest and welfare. Under the old law conscientious objectors performing alternate civilian service were under the control of local draft boards. Under the new law the National Director of Selective

Donny Hathaway Atco SD33-360

One of a critic's most pleasant tasks is introducing a hitherto unknown talent to the public and then watching him grow to the dimensions of superstardom. Not only is it enriching to the performer when this happens, but it manages to reinforce the critic's "I-told-you-so" ego as well. So sure am I about my projected status for Donny Hathaway that I would eat his big apple hat (his trademark) if he ever failed to make it really big. Among Black Music fanciers, of which I number myself one, he is now receiving the acclaim of fellow artists akin to that once bestowed upon Ray Charles and soul sister Aretha Franklin. As the album's liner notes state, "Carole King picked up eight copies of Donny's first LP and distributed them to her heaviest pals and gurus — such as Lou Adler and James Taylor — with the exhortation to dig." When the superstars start pickin' up on 'em, you know they must be heavy!

If that were not enough, Steve Stills asks his producer, "Hey, what's the chance of Donny Hathaway coming down to pick on my album?" The word is definitely out.

Donny Hathaway is the "baddest" cat currently on the scene, and his new LP, titled simply "Donny Hathaway" is proof that it's the singer, not the song that stops the show. I thought perhaps if I heard Ocean's "Put Your Hand in the Hand" one more time, I'd retch. But Donny puts their hackneyed attempt to shame and takes the tune back to the little black Baptist church on the edge of the ghetto where he learned the art of gospel song.

You can always tell a giant by the material he chooses, and on this album he picks up on Leon Russell's masterpiece "A Song For You," Bobby Scott's "He Ain't Heavy, He's My Brother," Mac Davis' joyful "I Believe in Music" and contributes his own beautiful "Take A Love Song" to the fare.

Not only does the man sing the blues, he's also paid his dues by composing, arranging, playing keyboards, and producing for such notables as Roberta Flack, Curtis Mayfield, Jerry Butler, The Impressions, and the Staples Singers.

All this should be enticing enough to make you wanna rush out and pick up a copy of "Donny Hathaway," date it, and wait a while to remind your pals that "Hell, I was into Donny Hathaway back when. . . " If that sounds a bit too devious, just dig it because you love it. Right on, brother!

Letters to the Editor

Letters to the editor should be addressed to: Editor, The Juniatian, Box 667, Juniata College, Huntingdon, Pa. 16652. The editors reserve the right to print only non-libelous and responsible content and to edit all letters and commentaries submitted to The Juniatan. The staff also reserves the right to publish all full signatures unless the writer can supply valid reason for omitting his name.

It was apparent from some of the questions asked of Dr. Asimov on December 2 that not everyone agreed with his theme or his methods of presenting it in his lecture that night. But if you asked them what it was that they disliked about the lecture, they could at least give a coherent reason for their opinion without resorting to nitpicking and assertions without supporting facts. Too bad the same cannot be said for "Not Everyone Likes Isaa cAsimov," the wretched excuse for a lead article in the December 8 issue of The Juniatian.

The first two-thirds of the piece is an incoherent criticism of Dr. Asimov for telling so many jokes in the course of the lecture. What is so horrible about that? Dr. Asimov did come to a serious and sensible conclusion to lecture, so the whole thing was not just one long comedy monolog. We seriously doubt he would have kept the attention of his audience through the entire lecture if he had remained dead serious throughout.

Speaking of the point of the lecture, Mr. Evans states that Dr. Asimov concluded with the idea "that one day man would create the perfect machine which would do away with the necessity for man." What lecture did he attend? We distinctly heard Dr. Asimov conclude with the thought that scientists must now develop a social conscience so that their advances do not do more harm than good. If this is an invalid conclusion why doesn't Mr. Evans say so and say why, instead of attacking the method in which Dr. Asimov brought out this point?

In the final third of the article, Mr. Evans finally decides to write seriously, and he admits that the reason he has attacked Dr. Asimov is only because he disagrees with Dr. Asimov as to the origin of man. We must point out that the Biblically-described origin of man has not been proven; neither has the evolutionary theory been proven; they are both theories. Dr. Asimov believes that man evolved from apes; Mr. Evans believes that God created man. Because there are no proven facts concerning the origin of man, it is useless for one side to try and discredit the other. Dr. Asimov merely indicated that he believed the theory of evolution. In his excellent lecture of Friday morning entitled "The Origins of Life" (which it is obvious Mr. Evans did not hear) he cited some powerful evidence to support evolution and the non-Biblical creation of life. At no time did he attack or put down the advocates of a God-created man. Yet, in the story of his appearance, we are treated to the spectacle of Mr. Evans attacking Dr. Asimov and giving as the only reason for his doing so the fact that Dr. Asimov had the nerve to disagree with him.

We absolutely fail to understand the last paragraph of this article: "At the close of the lecture, Dr. Asimov accepted questions from the audience. This was a mistake". Oh, really? Why? Dr. Asimov answered the questions to the best of his ability, considering most of them were of a general nature. Anyone who has listened to a politician answer questions knows that he will usually spend several minutes saying absolutly nothing, no matter how direct the questions. Dr. Asimov at least tried to give a direct answer to each question. Why was this a mistake? As with the rest of the article, Mr. Evans fails to give any reasons for his statements.

Finally, we feel The Juniatian should have tried to present both sides in its coverage of Dr. Asimov's visit. An article which tried to be objective, or one written by someone who enjoyed the lecture could have also been printed so that the reader could get a truer picture of the event. We do not object to the fact that Mr. Evans disagreed with Dr. Asimov and the way he conducted his lecture, but we do object to the lack of reasoning behind his criticisms. For such an important event in the school year as the Will Judy lecture, the school paper ought to try to present balanced, sensible reporting.

"Jingle Bells ?"

by Gerald J. Croce

On December 12, the Department of Music presented the Concert Choir, Choral Union and College-Community Orchestra in a concert featuring Esther M. Doyle as guest artist. The entire performance was under the direction of Bruce A. Hirsch.

The program, all music of the 20th century, was one which New York or Boston could take pleasure in—let alone Huntingdon, Pa. —and despite the cries, "What happened to Jingle Bells?" most audience reaction was favorable. Evidently, Mr. Hirsch's concerts (this one was my first) have some reputation because Oller Hall was packed.

The first part of the program included the Alleluia of Randall Thompson, the Cherubic Hymn (op. 37) of Howard Hansen, and four poems of Robert Frost set to music by Randall Thompson in a selection entitled Frostiana. In this composition the chorus a capella worked in concert with guest artist Esther Doyle. Miss Doyle satisfied the literary interest by reading the poems and creating a mood which was both complemented and enhanced when each of the poems was followed by the chorus singing its musical adaptation.

The mood darkened after intermission when Miss Doyle and the Concert Choir were joined by the Choral Union and members of the College-Community Orchestra to treat the audience to a somewhat bombastic but nevertheless thrilling performance of Ralph Vaughan Williams' Dona Nobis Pacem. Charged is perhaps the most adequate description of the piece and its performance. The hall was charged with sound, the music with beauty, and the performers with tremendous enthusiasm, great intelligence and artistry. And, while the strings had difficulty with the pitch at times, and Miss Strock, less often, with the tessitura, these lapses were more than compensated for by the overall effect.

The composition itself, a vivid prano soloist Shirley Strock and baritone William Dick. Esther Doyle rendered the text most effectively with superb intelligence, power, and sensitivity.

The composition itself a vivid dramatic exposition, portrays with great passion the human condition and a plea for help. There may be those who desire greater refinement, think Dona Nobis Pacem melodramatic, devoid of intellectual stimulation — whatever that means in music. Fortunately, I'm not one of those. Music remains for me a highly emotional experience, which is why I found the December 12 concert rather electrifying.

Service has the responsibility for administering the conscientious objector work program. The guidelines have been broadened for acceptable work and state directors have been delegated the responsibility of assigning and reviewing work assignments for these men.

Our involvement with youth is a continuing activity. An informal survey, for example, shows that we will need to replace approximately one quarter of our local board membership because of the new maximum age requirements of the law. While the draft system will suffer from the loss of these dedicated men and women, we are eager to take advantage of this opportunity to replace them with young men and women reflecting the ethnic, educational and social backgrounds of registrants across the nation.

Appointed by the President upon the recommendation of the state governor, the local board member holds, perhaps, the most important position in the Selective Service System. A young man or woman who might be interested in serving on a local board or in assuming other volunteer positions in the Selective Service System should contact the office of his or her governor.

Many young people are asking themselves these days with a greater degree of seriousness than was displayed by previous generations where their values lay, what activities make their lives meaningful, and how they can better contribute to society. I hope that many young men and women will recognize these new opportunities to serve in the Selective Service as a worthwhile means of social involvement and public service. We need their help.

Huntingdon does not experience large numbers of violent crimes such as rape, murder, and armed robbery. The main crimes here are drunken driving and violation of state liquor laws, petty larceny, shoplifting, vandalism, and malicious mischief. For a community of its size, Huntingdon is even with the state average on the amounts of crimes committed in a municipality, with crimes involving alcohol at the head of the list. Naturally, there are the normal number of traffic violations and parking tickets.

One might wonder, what happens to the fines collected? All fines collected for traffic violations within the borough and violations of borough ordinances go to Huntingdon Borough. The cost placed by the magistrate goes to the state of Pennsylvania. Any fines or cost resulting from violations of state laws also go to the Commonwealth.

The police officer is really on the job twenty-four hours a day, even on days off. His authority exists only within the borough limits unless in pursuit. The off-duty policeman is permitted by law and encouraged by the department to carry his gun with him at all hours and use it if necessary. Again, the safety of the public is the officer's first concern in deciding upon the use of his weapon. The gun is primarily taught to be used as a defensive weapon.

The officer, off-duty, witnessing a crime, will experience less difficulty when becoming involved than the average citizen. His words and actions will be respected in court because he knows the laws. This does not mean that the average citizen does not have the power of arrest when witnessing a crime. The citizen may arrest a person upon the violation of any law merely by filing the necessary and proper information with the police department bearing jurisdiction and agreeing to appear at a hearing if necessary. There is no need for apprehension or to inform the offender of what one's intentions are. Ninety-five percent of the time the offender, knowing his guilt, will pay the summons he receives. In the case of a hearing, ninety-nine percent of the time the magistrate will honor the information he has received. Care should be taken, especially in harsher crimes, to regard one's own safety, as well as that of others on the scene as paramount, and to see that the necessary procedures are taken to avoid a civil suit.

During the interview, the Chief was asked if the department received any pressure from the college or college community. "No, they ask us not to come on the campus unless asked. If something happens, they request our help and if necessary we can call in the State Police. But we do not bother unless we witness a violation or know you have committed a crime and are up there on the campus, and know who it is. We call the college and inform them that we have information for an arrest, and they will make someone available to lead us to the right place." When asked if there were any crimes that increased noticeably when the college students were here, the Chief replied that the only noticeable crime increase was in traffic violation and some minor offenses, but this is proportional to an increase in the population of one-thousand to twelve hundred people.

Today the job of a policeman is more complicated, frustrating, and vital. The increasing demands on a police force are felt, even by smaller forces, such as the Huntingdon Police Department. Chief Wingate expressed the opinion that the techniques and mannerisms of police work will have to change, meaning here in Huntingdon, as well as everywhere else. However, in order for a law enforcement agency to be successful, they need the public's support. As Chief Wingate explained, "Without the support of your public, you can't do a job for them."

JC Alumni Club Gives First Award

Charles L. Jaquish, a graduate of Juniata Valley High School, has been awarded the Juniata College Alumni Club of Huntingdon County Sponsored Scholarship for the 1971-72 academic year.

In announcing the award, William F. Berrier, assistant to the dean of students at Juniata College and president of the Huntingdon County Alumni Club, stated that the scholarship is available for the first time this year. It was established as a result of the high level of financial support received from the more than 300 Juniata College alumni who reside in Huntingdon County.

A political science major in his senior year at Juniata, Jaquish is the son of Mr. and Mrs. John R. Jaquish, 177 South Fifth Avenue, Clarion, Pa. He was a member of the defensive unit of the Juniata College football team which held its opponents to 8.9 points per game this season to rank tenth nationally among small colleges.

THE STUDENT MOUTH

It's not the shaggy hair nor the bell bottoms nor the love beads nor the tie-dyed shirts that give the student his image. It's his mouth.

The student mouth is a complex creature. It can shout at demonstrations, whimper through Love Story, gasp in horror at the atrocities of war. But none of these gives us away as students. It's the Meaningful Dialogue — the zigzag big talk and the spaced-out small talk — that makes the student mouth — from tooth to lip — the unique organ it is.

Being a mouthy student, I decided to investigate the subject. I decided to get right to the throat of the problem. I asked a student what he perceived student language to be.

"The stud lingo? Man, that went out with the fifties. apping isn't where it's at, man. It's a big head trip. And you've got to have a good head in order to have a good mouth. Dig? Got the scene? It's a regular high."

Suffring from a regular low, I decided that perhaps the best way to investigate student language was to observe it. I wangled myself an invitation to the Student Life Seminar Workshop party and picked up a few mouthy tid-bits there.

I moved on toward a kid sitting in the yoga position contemplating his navel, which he referred to as Felix.

"Where is it at, little belly button? It is at where. Where what? Where whatever, that's what. Give me meaning. Say something, because I am really into you, oh navel 'o mine. Speak to me Felix." His stomach growled and he grinned. "Right on, Felix."

A group of mini skirts were standing around talking about their home ec class. Suddenly, a large boisterous girl — with sensitive eyes — pushed her way into the crowd. "Hey, sisters. Let's have a little group dynamics here. A little meaningful dialogue. My name is Betty and my primary interest is people. And, of course, the ongoing life process. We've got to get organized, sisters. Let's have a little intense on-going rap session here. You're all good heads. Now get it together."

"Um," said a small blonde coed. "I made a relevant blouse the other day. With a peace sign on the left shoulder. . ."

"Hello," I said to a sad-looking girl sitting on a pillow. "Talk to me."

"You married?"

"No."

"You want to get?"

"Not really. . ."

"I knew it! Rejection once again, Cecelia," she cried aloud to herself. "$15,000 it cost Mom and Daddy to send me to school—that's room and board and tuition, books, clothes and pills. That doesn't even include the nose job, the hair transplant, the dermatologist bills and getting my ears pierced, which is already sending Daddy to the poor house." She straightened out her St. Laurent chemise. "All that to send little Ciel to college

THE BIG HOUSE

directed by Alfred MacGuffin

The Clifton is running one movie all week long starting today, and I don't know anything about it, so I guess I won't write about that.

Instead, I suppose, I could indulge in the fine old January sport of concoting a Ten Best list. This is a particularly satisfying sort of exercise for critics because you get to flaunt your taste even more egregiously than usual, since no one can expect you to defend all ten of your choices in such a short space. A related advantage, from the columnist's point of view, is that you can bury in your Ten Best list one or two films that you liked but were embarrassed to review at the time because you didn't have the faintest notion what they were about. For example, if I made a '71 list I would stick W. R.: The Mysteries of Organisme down around the seventh spot, describe it with something like "Makavejev's deepest and most delightful film," then hope to god I wouldn't run into somebody at a party who wanted to know why it's profound.

Lists of the ten worst pictures of the past year are also lots of fun, and if you'd like to draw up one of your own I can help out by giving you several things to keep in mind. First, you don't really sift your brain for the worst films you can remember. A movie like Godzilla vs. the Smut People has no more place on a Ten Worst list than a Bowery bum does on a Worst Dressed list.

The whole thing to remember about a Ten Worst list is that it should be wielded like a shiv. To start out, you automatically put the top-grossing picture of the year at the top of your list—Mencken knew what he was talking about. Other slots should go to any movie with Pamela Tiffin in it, any movie based on a novel by Harold Robbins, and any movies with more than two scenes involving motorcycles or one scene involving baby ducks. You can also hold a place open for any film with the words "Sexual Freedom in" as part of its title, and that should still leave you room for waging vendettas with particular directors or with rival critics.

So much for lists. I've decided not to make one here because I've thought of something even more perverse to do: I'm going to recommend warmly the double bill that finished its run at the Clifton last night. If you missed it you've already screwed up your new year.

Actually, Two-Lane Blacktop wasn't all that great, although it started out looking like a biggie. Esquire published the screenplay before it was released and gave it a big cover riffle as the best picture of the year. It wasn't a dazzling screenplay though, and the year ended with poor old Arnold Gingrich serving himself a Dubious Achievement Award for pointing toward the bleachers and striking out.

Blacktop's plot involves two ultra-hip young men, referred to only as The Driver and The Mechanic, who hack around the country in an almost obscenely fast car and make their money by racing it. It's the kind of movie where the heroes do a lot of staring moodily into space and very little talking. When they do say anything, it is invariably about the car (which, quite rightfully, gets equal billing). Whether you like the film or not depends a lot on how you react to being in a room for two hours with people who aren't interested in discussing anything but automobiles. I know kids who dropped out of high school because of precisely those conditions.

James Taylor plays The Driver. The Sweet Baby isn't called upon to sing, and even fewer demands are made on his acting ability. The film's only real excellence is the part of a strung-out compulsive liar called GTO who agrees to race against The Car from the far west to Washington, D.C., with the titles to the two cars as stakes. Warren Oates is a first-rate actor who has been stuck in second-string parts for too long, and here he not only has his first succulant role, but he finds himself surrounded by amateurs. He's entitled to make the most of that situation, and he does, pulling the role of GTO off with absolute brilliance, and easily shutting down everybody else on the strip.

The other movie on the bill was the one not to miss. It was called Derby, and if the advertising for it gave you the impression that it was only a gaudy little nothing trying to exploit the noise and violence of the roller derby for a few bucks, that was what it was intended to be. The film-maker freely admits that he was hired by the roller derby people to make a film that would make the sport look glamorous and bring in crowds to the contests. They were pleased with what they got, and didn't mind in the least, if they even noticed, that the picture was also one of the most incisive documentary studies ever done of a certain stratum of American society.

A word about Roller Derby itself is perhaps in order. It's a sport that was trumped up in the late 1940's for television viewers. More and more people had sets, but the soaps and game show weren't in gear yet, and there were hours and hours of air time that needed filling, and so somebody noticed that this dumb game was cheap and had lots of action and

Edward Kinchley Evans

One painful alternative to the numbing sterility of Theory is exposure to Truth as seen through the eyes of one of God's magicians. Because the brilliance of the performance is Sun Bright, it hurts the eyes and the hateful rays of enlightenment stab at the brain causing discomfiture. Such is the price a few pay for their passage upward in Soul development towards a worthwhile existence and a constructive life.

There is a thought expressed in one of Thomas Troward's books that "patience is the most beautiful of the virtues and the least understood". It takes this virtue 'patience' to sit through a film such as "The Damned" offered Friday evening January 7 at Alumni Hall. Many were called to view this dazzling heart probe of a Day in the Life of the World that existed only a handful of years ago. Many exercised their 'freedom of vegetation' and left when the light focused down to a Lazer ray of steady disintegration of a World, a Society, a Family, an Individual. Fearing to see themselves reflected in this terrible mirror held by Luchino Visconti, they fled into the safety of the night and back to the less harrowing security of analyzation.

We have been gifted with a handful of film directors whose visions we are privileged to occasionally see. Among these are Viljot Sloman (491 - I Am Curious Yellow), Frederico Fellini (Satyricon-Juliet of the Spirits), Bergman (The Passions of Anna-The Seventh Seal), Andy Warhol (Chelsea Girls -Trash), and Luchino Visconti. Several seasons ago, Visconti turned his attention to the arid waste that is now Sicily and for a few brief moments in "The Leopard", caught in slow motion the decay and rotting away of a beautiful but decadent Society that had exhausted the fruitfulness of the soil and people. In essence, reflective of the present day Egypt, Mexico, Peru, etc. as compared to their former civilizations which are still remembered by the greatness of their vision in building structures that have weathered better than the people or societies that created them.

In "The Damned", Visconti has caught in his net of illusion one of the families that came into control of Germany's Steel Industries after the First World War, a family consisting of all that is good and bad in the Human Condition. On another level of awareness, the individual as macrocosm. As the New Germany emerged, it infested and fed off the putrefying remains of the Old. There is no compromise with Evil. One does not cure cancer either ignoring it or letting it fester. And the sickness here is thought. Visconti allows us to become aware that no matter how virile the physical body, it always succumbs to mental corruption.

It took patience to sit through

"Academic Tenure Under Fire"
Copyright 1971 by Matthew Finkin

Academic Tenure: The President's Commission on Campus Unrest urged a reconsideration of it. The A.C.E. Committee on Campus Tensions called for its reappraisal. And no less a figure than the newly appointed president of Rutgers University has wondered aloud whether tenure still serves a useful purpose.

The center of the debate over tenure appears to have shifted since the strife-torn years of '68 and '69 when criticism was based on student dissatisfaction and lack of "academic responsibility." Now, assertions of inefficiency and unproductivity abound in our financially aware decade.

Long-term contracts of faculty employment in lieu of tenure are now bandied about as a suggested panacea in pruning the dead wood from the academic grove. To understand what is at stake, students should consider the value of academic tenure.

Traditionally, tenure has meant that after some reasonable probationary period, a faculty member should be understood to be on continuous appointment. Once acquired, this status can only be terminated (1) for adequate cause, as demonstrated in a hearing before a tribunal of peers, or (2) as a result of a bona fide financial exigency or curtailment of a program of instruction.

The purpose served (apart from job security which is, itself, an inducement to enter the profession) is to insure the freedom of the professor to teach, research, publish and speak out on civic and institutional issues without fear of losing his job.

Possession of tenure does not per se protect incompetents; it assures that a school administration will come forward with its case under traditional Western notions of fair play.

The suggestion of long-term renewable contracts of employment in lieu of tenure—say, of 5 or 10 years' duration—seems to have all the asserted defects of the tenure system and none of the advantages. Certainly one advantage of the current system is that at some point in time a firm decision must be made on the promise the individual holds for the institution. An amiable colleague who comes close but doesn't quite make it will, doubtless after much agonizing, be given a timely terminal notice. The long-term contract approach, however, merely allows a continual postponement of firm decisions. It is unlikely that a passable colleague of 10, 15, or 20 years would find his contractual option not picked up.

Who, then, would realistically be affected under the long-term contract plan? Admittedly the blatantly unfit are reachable in any event even under the current system.

Clearly those most likely to suffer nonrenewal are the outspoken and controversial. To them possessing tenure is a very real protection for the exercise of academic freedom.

It is more than likely that the long-term contract approach will have a chilling effect. Faculty will of necessity be concerned that what they say in class, in print, or in faculty meetings will play a significant role in nonrenewal decisions.

Some assert, however, that academic freedom is so widely accepted that the tenure system is no longer needed. But one need only look at the ever growing list of schools censured by the American Association of University Professors for violations of academic freedom. Last year alone, almost 900 complaints of violations were filed with the A.A.U.P.

For students, an issue critical to their education lurks within the debate over tenure versus long-term contracts: What seems to be challenged is the autonomy of professors to teach, research, publish, and criticize as they see fit. If one accepts the assumption that students are no more than consumers of an educational service; and if a school's governing body has an unfetted right to control the manner of delivering that service; then, without question, tenure is a serious impediment to academic administration. But, then, so too is academic freedom.

Preparation Course for Pre-Meds

Senior or graduate students who are considering recognized medical school overseas for the Fall 1972 session will be interested in the announcement by European Medical Students Placement Service, Inc., of Albertson, N.Y., of their comprehensive program to aid and assist a limited number of qualified students to secure admission and achieve successful adaptation to a recognized European medical school.

Their comp rehensive program consists of the following:

1) Intensive 8 week orientation course, attended with other American students, to help the student adapt the the new country, culture, and school environment.
2) Intensive 8 week special practical and language course, programmed for the American student entering a European medical school. It has been found that regular domestic language courses do not serve the total need of the medical school student.

Nine'y-per-cent of the difficulty in attending and remaining in a foreign school is the language barrier and poor adjustment to the country. These courses are designed to overcome this problem and are given in the country where the student will attend the medical school.

European Medical Students Placement Service, Inc., will arrange lodging for the student during this 8 week period.

There are many other services available, outlined in a brochure available from European Medical Students Placement services.

Students who will have received their degree on or before June, 1972, can write for an application form and brochure to:

Today it may be safe to smoke a joint and theorize on the 'immorality' of the Vietnamese encounter but tomorrow we may be called upon to show our colors in a War that is moral. A war that can't be finger gestured away.

The responsibility for the safety of the World is soon to be shouldered by you. Let us then see how you cope with this awesome task. Will you have developed your patience to the virtue of negotiation and enlightened alternatives or will you succumb to the impatience of physical re-action? Bullets ripped through the guts of a bunch of naked soldiers who thought they had Germany in the palm of their hands. If you think you have this World in yours, I would suggest you clothe your mental body with as much protective armour that your time can buy.

Pro - Con: Are Finals Worth It?

STOP! Before we go any further we want to say one thing, "HELP!" It appears that even four witty, intelligent, young scholars such as ourselves can run out of ideas, so we are expanding our staff to, shall we say, infuse a bit of new blood into our collumn's iron-poor veins. What we especially need are some creative, witty, young, attractive ladies. Contact our editor, Scott Leedy, at Box 667 or in the Ellis Hall Juniatian office.

We also need ideas for future columns and comments on past ones. We are: Bill Dick, Nancy Diehl, Mike Finkle, and Willie Robison. If you see us, tell us what's on your mind.

Now, this week's column:

Dear Frosh,

Next week you will be priviledged to witness a social phenomenon unparalleled by anything you have ever seen in your sweet little lives. Like lemmings to the sea, the upperclassmen shall march to that most glorious of all finales, the final examination.

See upperclassmen stay up til all hours! Watch with horror as they turn on friends, foes, and freshmen! Be amazed at the bloodshot eyes, trembling hands, haggered features, and stumbling footsteps of shell-shocked veterans returning from the front! All of this in pursuit of the most hallowed of of Juniata's awards—The Grade!

To prepare for this new and delightful experience, the Pro and Con staff brings you fragmented thoughts on this topic.

"As a Bio major I feel that you need finals. Do you know what I mean?" blurted Jeff Ciampa. Well, not really, Jeff. Maybe your roomie could clear things up for us.

Roomie? "As far as this system goes, each individual class should decide for itself if there should be a final or not. You need finals in some courses, especially in the natural sciences in a competitive aspect as to graduate school. In other cases it should be left up to the professor and students. Jeff's roomie is Doug Marschka.

Jack Alexander didn't see any "need for change in the final structure as it stands now, except that five finals in a week is too much." He'd like to spread them over two weeks.

Straddling the fence, Jim Pye, quoting from his experience at another institution said, "It is nice to have finals because they are helpful for the professor in determining the student's overall proficiency in the course, but they should not be worth more than a regular test. They are more meaningful to the professor as a check on his own ability and competence."

Winging into con, Dave Philo views finals "as a great way to rest up after a tough semester filled with papers and tests. They are comparable to that last great dagger the professor holds over the student's head."

Chris McFarland had some innovations. "I'd like to see some open book finals and more contract grading. The trouble is, it's easier for the faculty to follow the lead of the administration in the present structure of finals than to reach out and discover something unique for their course."

So that's the picture freshmen. Next week take care of that upperclassman living next to you. See you next semester.

Love,

Pro and Con.

The rules aren't worth going into: all you need to know is that the game is played on a banked oval track, and consists of teams of men and women skating around and pummeling each other. Most of the violence is blatantly scripted but not quite all of it. (It is a grotesque truth, for example, that many members of women's teams have to have their left breast removed after years of absorbing elbow shots. The Amazonian archeresses had nothing on these ladies in the way of dedication to their craft.)

The film-maker, Robert Kaylor, admits that the fascination of the movie is largely due to a piece of blind luck. As he was shooting some atmosphere footage one night, without any real plan about how to organize the film, a young fan walked into the dressing room and asked one of the derby stars how he could become a roller derby star himself. Kayler was at a loss to account for anyone's having such an ambition, and in an attempt to fathom the mystery, he built his whole movie around the young man. He lived with the man and his wife for a while, followed him to his job, to his friends' houses, even on noctural tomcatting expeditions—always with a camera.

The film that resulted from all this is infinitely more than an introduction to roller derby. It is an introduction to a lower-middleclass culture that presumably is all around us, but which, for me at least, was as exotic and inaccessible as anything that Flaherty ever shot in the Arctic or the South Sea Islands.

Printing Press Demonstrated To L. S. Students

Nine Juniata undergraduates are enrolled in a library science course taught by Mrs. Catlin. Their studies will prepare them for graduate school in the library sciences.

One class was devoted to a demonstration of hand printing on the Washington Iron Press now located in the Archives Room in the basement of the Beeghly Library. The press was originally used by the founders of Juniata College at James Creek and later in Morrisons Cove. It was presented to the college by Mr. Blair Brice, publisher of the Pennsylvania Mirror in State College, Pa.

The students have an opportunity to gain printing experience by producing Christmas cards and other ephemera on the famous old press.

Fads for Lassies and Lads

Here's a fashion forecast for you, boys, coming from a reliable authority. This fall the undergrad's clothes are divided into three general categories: campus and class, formal and semi-formal, town and weekend. For campus and classroom you'll wear sport jackets and flannel trousers. And here we enter a fervent plea —PLEASE— match those plaids and stripes; don't mix them. A combination that's tops is tweed and covert cloth. Your shoes are the sturdy brogue-type; and here's something we know you'll go for—you may go the limit with extravagant socks.

Clothes for town and weekend go to the other extreme, a conservative business-like suit being the best choice. And for those who like the very best when dressing formally, top hat and tails have come into their own. But if you can't persuade yourself to wear them, the single and double-breasted tux ranks next. However, the single-breasted is more formal.

You also have trade marks that write "Campus Man" as plain as day on you. College men definitely wear their trousers short to show off those flashy plaid and check socks. They're sticking to the button-down, collar attached shirts throughout their entire wardrobe—even for formal affairs.

Ensuing columns are going to tell you how to wear those college clothes—at what angle to tip your hat, how much cuff shows from your coat sleeve, and many more things. In the meantime let's have better dressed men on the J.C. campus.

Juniata Takes Susquehanna In Overtime Period

by Pat Monahan

January Sixth's basketball game against Susquehanna brought victory to Juniata in overtime. The game was the first victory for the Indians.

The first quarter was disastrous for the Indians because of Susquehannas' overpowering court press and man-to-man defense.

It was not until the second quarter that the Indians closed the wide gap and ended the first half 41-44 in Susquehanna's favor.

The second half was filled with key interceptions for Juniata as well as costly turnovers. It was in the fourth quarter that the Indians first tied their opponent with Ron Straley's free throws, hitting both of them under pressure, making the score 70-70. The game continued with back to back baskets ending the game with a 78-78 score.

The overtime belonged to the Indians with accurate shooting from the floor. The difference was that they worked better under the pressure than Susquehanna did, hitting only 25% of their floor shots.

The Indians' overall shooting statistic was 43%. High scorers of the game were Straley with 17 points; Clemens with 15; Sigley had 14 with 18 rebounds; Podgorski with 11; and Ober with 10 points.

Women's Basketball Team Acheives Record Victory

by Vernne L. Wetzel

The women's basketball team has done it; they have won their season's opening game, thus making themselves the only Juniata team to have done so. Juniata defeated Messiah College by the score of 35-28 on Saturday. Messiah used a player-to-player defense, while the Juniata girls used a zone defense. In the first few minutes of the game Messiah led by a few points, but by the end of the quarter our team led 11-9 and held the lead for the rest of the game. The half-time score was 16-12.

The third quarter was the best for the Indians. They held Messiah's scoring to 7 points while they scored 11 points, at times having a 10-point lead over the opponent. This advantage carried through the fourth quarter to give us the win. The high scorers for Juniata were Sue Hutt, a freshman, with 8 points and Mary Ann Repman, a junior with 7 points. Michele campbell, Vernne Wetzel, Tracy Kielblock, Sue Roshirt, and Julie Harman also added to the score for Juniata. Only one JC player fouled out of the game, and Juniata was 5 for 13 from the foul line.

There was a good crowd on hand to witness the victory. The game was played according to men's rules, and the officials were Mike Yelovich and Ted Nypaver. The high scorers for Messiah were Brenda Painter and Darlene Wisler, each having six points.

A junior-varsity game was played. Three six-minute quarters made. Messiah took an early lead to win 22-3. The scorers for Juniata were Jude Rottenburg with 2 points, and Tracy Kielblock with a free throw for 1 point. Deb Hutchison was the high scorer for Messiah. All of the players on the Juniata team played in the varsity game, and some of them played a J V game at Messiah's request.

Juniata held a scrimmage with the high school on Wednesday. This allowed the coaches, Mo Taylor and Scott Gustafson, to determine a defense and the players for the regular schedule games. More scrimmages may be played. The rest of the schedule follows:

so she could find a husband. Well — look at me. Look at me, will you? What good did it do? Do I look engaged to you? Look at my left hand. Do you see an engagement ring? Even a ring mark? As naked as Adam — if I could only find Him. What's wrong with me? Why can't I get a man?"

"You mean 'old man,' I interrupted.

"I don't like old men."

"No no no. You've got to learn to talk with it."

"With what? I should learn to talk? $1,500 they spend on braces and he's telling me I don't know how to talk."

"The student jargon. You've got to learn to be hip — or is it hep? Well, whatever. Why don't you go over to that guy sitting there with his legs crossed and ask him how Felix is. Ask him if he's got an old lady. Maybe you two can, ah, groove together."

"Well, what the hell," she said, getting up. "It doesn't cost anything. Thanks," she said, and then added, "Daddy-o."

The kid and Cecelia were married two weeks later in one of those terribly Now new weddings in Central Park. Cecelia wore gold lame Correges boots. Felix froze his navel off. Ciel's father is buying him a new one.

"What are you doing here?" a bespectacled, be-bearded fellow said, grabbing my arm. "Why are you wasting your time when there's a war going on, killer? People are starving in Africa, glutton. Women are discriminated against, chauvinist pig. Education needs reforming, dummy. There's crime in our big cities, criminal. The plight of the migrant worker, racism, the drug problem. And you're sitting here at a party."

"But so are you," I pointed out.

"That's different," he said. "This is my party. Excuse me." He walked over to another guy. "What are you doing here? People are starving in Africa, glutton. . ."

"Far out, man," the kid answered. "Like, um, like, well, like, y'know, groovy, wow, like man, like I can't relate. It's a real bummer and like all that but, wow. . ."

I had had enough. Between all the relevance and relating, the head trips and the dead trips, I decided to like split. I marched right out of the party to the beat of a different bummer.

Charles Schoenherr Resigns JC Dean Post

President John Stauffer recently announced the resignation of Dr. Charles W. Schoenherr, dean of students at Juniata College. Schoenherr is to be replaced by Thomas B. Robinson, administrative assistant to the president, when his resignation becomes effective on February 12, 1972.

Schoenherr's resignation was not brought about by frictions of any sort with the administration in his role as dean of students; rather, his decision to leave Juniata was the result of an offer made by the new Mackinac College: Schoenherr will become its first vice president when the Michigan college's doors are opened in September, 1972.

It was noted that Robinson's qualifications as Schoenherr's replacement include his experience in student personnel positions, extensive student counseling, and his graduate studies in counselor education and higher education administration at The Pennsylvania State University, where he is currently completing his doctoral studies.

When questioned as to the matter of Schoenherr's resignation, Robinson replied that he was certainly sorry to see Dean Schoenherr leave Juniata. As far as future plans for his new post, Robinson expressed a definite concern to learn to know the students, and to help them in any way possible. "I'd like to work for general student responsibility with regards to campus life styles. I think we've taken a step in the right direction by allowing the student more freedom with the new open dorm and curriculum policies." Robinson promised to divulge more of his proposed policies at a later date, but in any case, he is looking forward toward his new responsibilities in working with the students.

Dr. Schoenherr has been dean of students and associate professor of psychology at Juniata since 1966. Prior to his appointment at Juniata he served from 1959 to 1966 as director of admissions at Wheaton College in Illinois, where he had received his bachelor of science degree in 1950. Earlier, he served Wheaton as dean of men from 1953 to 1956, and was a science teacher at McKinley Junior High School in Racine, Wisconsin, for three years.

He earned his M.A. degree in guidance at Northwestern University in 1954, and in 1965 he received his doctor of education degree from Teachers College of Columbia University.

Yagi Antenna Plays Key Role in Physics Experiment

by Patrick Minnick

Have you noticed the antenna on the Physics wing of the Science Building? Although you might think so, it is not an attempt to bring Sesame Street math lessons to the Physics majors. It's a Yagi antenna built especially to receive only one frequency, 250 megacycles, and it plays an important part in an experiment by upperclassman Ken Nichols.

In his experiment, Ken plans to receive and record synchrotron radio waves which come in at the 250 megacyle frequency and to attempt to form a corollary with this information and recordings of gamma radiation during the same time period. Synchrotron waves are basically electrons produced in space which when moved through a magnetic field, rotate and give off a magnetic force.

The theoretical source of these waves, if also a source of gamma rays, is the origination point of phenomenally high energy rays which could not possibly be made in our solar system. These high energy rays are thought to be produced by nuclear reactions taking place at a truly cataclysmic level some place outside our galaxy. However, magnetic fields within the galaxy bend the rays and prevent determination of the point of their origin.

Hopefully by using the synchrotron waves and gamma rays, the source of the high energy rays can be located and man can discover what is really going on out there.

Ken's operation is not yet functional because of electrical engineering problems, but after operating long enough to gain sufficient evidence (at least a month) the information will be fed into a computer to see if a corollary can be drawn between action of the synchrotron waves and the gamma rays.

Assistant Editors' Note

Because JC upperclassmen were burdened with final exams during the period in which this issue of the Juniatian went to press, few were available to aid in compiling it. Thus, this publication is for the most part a Freshmen effort. (The services of a few regular upperclassmen columnists and photographers had to be employed.) It should be a fair approximation of what next year's paper will look like at the outset, as many of the upperclassmen currently working on the paper will graduate.

NOTICE

JUNIATIAN READERS

The Juniatian will not be published on January 26, or February 2, 1972, in keeping with stated staff policy which allows for the discontinuance of publishing during vacation and examination periods.

The next "Juniatian," Volume XLVIII, No. 14, will appear on February 9, 1972.

Faculty Makes Changes In Graduation Requirements

by Henry Siedzikowski

Recently, Juniata College has undergone many calendar changes. Most of them have directly benefited the freshmen, but indirectly put an added burden on the shoulders of the upperclassmen. On Wednesday, January 12, the faculty took action directed at easing that burden.

First, the faculty decided to reaffirm the distinction between courses on a unit basis (a unit is equivalent to 3.5 credit hours) and the credit-hour system. Both will be offered next year.

Also, the faculty passed several changes that will be permitted in schedule planning for students who will graduate after January 1, 1973 (current Juniors and Sophomores). It is important to note that these changes were passed to modify, not lessen graduation requirements.

Right now, a student (upperclassman) is required to take a minimum of eight courses in his department of major study. He must also take six courses in collateral areas. And finally, he must take either seven or eight courses to fulfill distribution requirements (the exact number is determined by the division his major is in).

Following the action taken by the faculty, a current Junior may delete one course in any one of these areas. However, he may drop a course in only one of these areas. For example, a student may elect to fulfill his requirements with only seven courses in his major, but keep six collateral courses and seven or eight distribution courses. Or, he may keep eight courses in his major department and seven or eight distribution courses, but elect to have only five courses in his area of collateral study.

A current Sophomore will be allowed to graduate with one less course in any two of these areas. For instance, a student may decide to fulfill his graduation requirements with only seven courses in his major department and only five in his collateral area, but keep seven or eight distribution courses (again depending on the division for the exact number). These actions were taken, because under the unit system, students will pick up more credit hours with fewer courses. However, 120 credit hours will still be needed for graduation.

There are many combinations that a student could use. These were merely examples, and not recommendations.

The other action taken by the faculty in regard to graduation requirements was that departmental requirements within divisional categories were eliminated in addition to references to laboratory experience. For example, a Division II major, under the new ruling, will be able to fulfill his distribution requirements in Division I by taking a total of any four courses, as long as they are eligible to fulfill distribution requirements in Division I, regardless of how many departments they include. This means that there are no longer any departmental limitations. He may fulfill his Division III distribution requirements by taking any three courses which are eligible as distribution courses. The important change here is that two lab courses are no longer required.

Mr. Nolan, the Registrar, strongly urges that a student who has any doubts about any of these changes stop by the Registrar's Office to have their questions answered. He also wishes to announce that registration will be held in Ellis Hall Ballroom instead of the Women's Gym.

Wave

by George Magruder

Two years ago I started to swim away from the shore, the quiet beach into the crashing waves and rolling sand, trying to reach up to see,
through the grinding turmoil never at rest.
And still the waves are breaking, continuously, roaring in my ears with the undertow pulling down.
But with every wave I was lifted—forward, higher, and I could see more—,
only to be pulled back down.
Yes, every crest was larger than before, higher up, and closer to—?
But before I could see it all, understand,
I was dragged down fom the blue into the crushing, cloudy sand.
With every seventh wave
I would climb, struggle up to the crest and look for a sand bar—, then try to get to the rolling swell.
Oh for a tranquil place to rest that could offer—but they seemed so far, so far away from the raging breakers and rising waves.
And if I tore away from the crushing surf, got to that swell, then I would feel the tug from the undertow, the rising wave, and then the steady smooth current, an incessant pull—flowing continuously-greenish blue, towards?
In confusion I would perceive the sandbars—as if nothing could be so beautiful.
As lovely images I saw them, soft white sand surrounded by calm elucid waters, sparkling blue, with clear bright cloudless sky over them.
They made me believe, and I knew that if I reached one I would understand everything I had tried to achieve—and more, the true, back in those tumultuous waves on that rocky shore.

Letters to the Editor

Letters to the editor should be addressed to: Editor, The Juniatian, Box 667, Juniata College, Huntingdon, Pa. 16652. The editors reserve the right to print only non-libelous and responsible conters and to edit all letters and commentaries submitted to The Juniatan. The staff also reserves the right to publish all full signatures unless the writer can supply valid reason for omitting his name.

Dear Concerned Whom:

This communique is primarily for those who can sentimentally hearken back to the Goode Olde dayse of the Sheet-Metal Age (Late Devouring Period) when Juniata had an almost-to-God coffeehouse. However, any fool will do. This is not one of your conventional "Where are they now?" or "Golly gosh, gang, let's group up and hold our breaths until we get it back!" letters. I have decided to bend my massive intellect to this long-ignored casus nihil, for which so many have struggled valiantly but futilely. Now it's my turn.

The main question of "What are we going to do about this intolerable situation, Cisco?" can be broken into assorted rocks, gryphons, and other clinkers, but for pity of the layout men I will dissertate upon only the two main subphyla of "Why?" and "How?".

"Why should we disinter this sleeping giant? Is it really worth it?" A valid question if I remember the institution correctly. It seemed to suffer from the "coffeehouse syndrome"; i.e., "intimate" (bad) lighting, good amateur performers to sing and be ignored, cave paintings, etc. In other words, a good place to have a quiet chat over a small roach, but not really worth dying for. I propose that "coffeehouse" be buried with a phoneme fricative through its heart, and nothing used instead. This "Nothing," which we will consider ourselves as building, must be much more entertaining than the obsolescent model. However, by entertainment I mean more than just a background to the inmates' babbling. Surprise them! Astound them! Rob them. Along with the usual musical fare of aspiring young millionaires, have classical nights, hard-rock stomps, opera, lightshows, etc. And certainly not just music: chess tournaments, student plays, wrestling matches, dramatic readings, lectures on obscure subjects by obscure professors, etc. ad infinitum. A sort of Fireside Theater East, a General Insanity Ward for the students (and faculty) to release their frustrations in. Randomness is the key. Keep the patrons off-balance, and they have to pay attention in order to be sure the door is where they left it. In the process, they may become interested enough to return, perhaps even to participate. Maybe they'll even stay awake.

Next question: "How are we to keep it going?" i.e. "Who's going to run it for me?" This is common noise around this area, very often (and very audibly) deplored by the more fiery of our colleagues, who have decided that there is Nothing To Be Done About It (Apatheticus Juniatiens), and have apparently decided to bore from within. However, if we consider the phenomenon, it is easy to understand that a coffeehouse could be placed secondary to grades and other goodies. Ergo, we must find a good method of forcing people into deciding they would like to be a part of this grand undertaking.

Why couldn't an "Entertainment-type-stuff 201" course be organized? Advantages: credit for time and work, a teacher to serve as a continuing nucleus, and other obvious facets. "They'd never approve it." Why not? ~~Drama~~ classes could be unleashed totally, Sociology could note the effects on college and area affairs, Psychology could design entertainment for maximum effect, Physics could design light shows and special effects, Biology and Chemistry could watch, and so on. Something for everyone.

This, I hope, is a good start—the rest is left as an exercise for the student.

PBS Film Series to Present Movie Classics

You will be able to see some of the greatest motion pictures of all time on WPSX channel 3 at 8:30 P.M. every Friday from January 14 until July 7. Films by Hitchcock, Truffaut, Antonioni, Bergman, Eisenstein, Renoir, Polanski, Cocteau, Kurosawa and many other great movie makers will be shown without commercials or editing of any kind. Following the screening of each picture will be a discussion, often with someone involved in the making of the film.

Beginning this week and continuing until the end of second semester THE JUNIATIAN will present a brief synopsis of each film that is to be shown. Take advantage of this extraordinary series every Friday until July 7 at 8:30 P.M. on channel 3.

Jan. 21 — The Blue Angel (1930) Josef von Sternberg. With Marlene Dietrich and Emil Jannings. A Pedantic professor falls in love with a sleezy night club singer, Lola Lola. His glum descent from pride and importance to humiliation and insignificance is brutally charted in disconsolate visuals and piercing sound effects. One of the best films of its time, generally considered to be a film classic. Great performances by Jannings and a saucy Marlene Dietrich.

Jan. 28 — Grand Illusion (1937) Jean Renoir. With Jean Gabin and Erich von Stroheim. Near the top of any list of the world's greatest films must come Jean Renoir's anti-war classic, La Grande Illusion. Set against a prison escape of French aviators from a German prison camp in World War I, Erich von Stroheim and Jean Gabin enact this drama of the fading glory and honor of war. This film will also be shown on campus as part of the Center Board Film Series on April 29, 1972.

Feb. 4 — M (1930) Fritz Lang. With Peter Lorre. Peter Lorre, in a flawless performance, recreates the claustrophobic, psycholic Universe of a child-rapist who is hunted by the police as well as the criminal class. Based on the fiendish killings which spead terror among the inhabitants of Duesseldorf in 1929, the film molds the desperate and negative qualities of early sound film into a tremendously evocative cinematic unity.

Sly and the Family Stone "There's a Riot Goin' On" Epic KE 30986

How misleading is the tit'e of this latest gem from Sly and the Family Stone! If there's a riot goin' on here perhaps I'm playing this disc at the wrong speed. Or is the riot goin' on within Sylvester Stone? While taking us higher, Sly's completely cleared Earth's atmosphere. Don't get me wrong—this is a significant album. And I hope this is the direction soul music is taking —call it "Urban Space Music" if you will. Can you imagine a concert from the young Ray Charles taking place on the Moon? If so, then you may be able to grasp the essence of this album.

Obviously Sly's borrowed his electronic (not electric) approach from Weather Report and Miles Davis. This is definitely the way to employ electronic instruments; not just as if playing amplified acoustical ones, but by exploiting those unique timbres to their very limitations. The fantastic interplay of wah-wah guitar with echo-plexed piano and voices continues the pastiche originated by the Family on "Dance to the Music", but their music now has the stamp of FUTURE all over it.

It's been over two years since Sly has recorded, and I'm glad that when he decided to do so he was able to come up with something creatively stimulating. Actually, I never expected anything less. For lyricists, Epic has provided a separate sheet for which we should all be thankful. Sly slurs, drops off words in one breath and picks them up on the next, so it's often pretty difficult to discern what has passed. Also, the echoes have a way of teasing your ears. So if you're the type who enjoys decoding messages. . .have a ball A. J. Weberman. I imagine there's something in there, but for me it's not integral for enjoying this record. For kicks, take the LP's final cut "Thank You For Talkin' to Me Africa" and contrast it with that old chestnut "Thank You Falettinme Be Mice Elf Agin". They're both the same song, only "Africa" captures that stoned soul quality that characterizes the entire album.

If the groove of "Family Affair" zapped you between the ears then you'll dig this album. "Riot" comes close to the Soundtrack for Your Mind promised by Weather Report, only perhaps Sly is more accessible because of his soul, not jazz, heritage. Nevertheless, it heralds an optimistic coming together of both Black forms.

Just when it looked like trendy acoustical music was bringing us down to earth again, Sly and the Family (Stoned) reappear to focus our attentions skyward.

Whatever you do. . .devour this record with your ears!

In 1938 the industry launched a campaign to convince the public that it would be "motion pictures' greatest year." The thirties' audience had even more reason to be skeptical about such determined self-hyping than those of us in the cynical seventies, but one could argue that Hollywood made good its promise. Some of my favorite movies were shot in 1938.

Think about it. Hawks gave us Hepburn and Grant in one of the funniest comedies ever made, Bringing up Baby, and Hitchcock chipped in with what many regard as his all-time best, The Lady Vanishes. Another batch of pictures were shot in '38 but didn't hit the screen until '39. Ford had two of these in Stagecoach and Young Mr. Lincoln; Lubitsch another with Garbo in Ninotchka. Those who could afford to were tinkering with new color processes. What they came out with wasn't always realistic, but those late 30's color films are oddly delightful these days, particularly those two magnificent fantasies, Zoltan Korda's Thief of Baghdad and Victor Fleming's Wizard of Oz. And of course Mr. Fleming also found time during those same two years to throw together a little number called Gone With the Wind.

Gone With the Wind will be playing all this week at the Clifton, from Wednesday the 19th until Tuesday the 25th. This is the version that was souped up in the '60's — they stretched the image out to fill a wide screen and goosed the soundtrack somehow. They haven't hurt it any though, and if you've never seen it you are living in a state of cultural and aesthetic sin: go this week.

Not that I can promise you that everything you've heard about it is true. It is not, for instance, the greatest film ever made, or even the best American one. It will not tell you everything you'll ever need to know about the Civil War, or about the ante- or post-bellum South.

On the other hand, if the film-heads you hang out with have led you to believe that Wind is nothing but kitsch, you have an agreeable surprise coming.

I had let it blow past me each time it was re-released until two years ago, and I went to see it then only with great wariness. I'm incurably suspicious, I suppose, of pictures that list the producer's name in larger letters than the director's. Selznick's name was larger than the title in some of the ads. I had been frightened too by those polls that appear from time to time listing the aesthetic tastes of U. S. Senators. There are always lots of guys who list Gone with the Wind as their all-time favorite film, and they're usually the ones who also pick Grandma Moses as their favorite painter and Robert Service as their favorite writer. However, in spite of all my misgivings, I had a good time.

To start with, sheer spectacle can be impressive. Anybody with enough money can burn down Atlanta, of course, but if you've got a guy around who knows where to put the cameras, he can make the torching of a city damned exciting for an audience. And there were lots of guys involved in this project who knew where to put the cameras.

But this movie gives us more than spectacle for spectacle's sake; it is often making fairly complex visual points at the very times its effects are grandest. For example, notice the well-known railroad depot scene. It begins with the camera tight on Scarlett, who is picking her way through a group of wounded Confederate soldiers who have been spread out on the ground near the depot to await medical help. As she proceeds across the area, the camera dollies back, back, back to reveal that the men in the original shot are only a tiny portion of what we eventually perceive as several acres of mutilated humanity. It works. All of the intended feelings about the waste and horror

Pro - Con : Term Papers ?

The storm has hit again, burying its victims in barrages of books, 3"x5" cards, crumpled papers, used carbon, typewriters, and eraser dust. What natural disaster could inflict such chaos upon our fair campus? It's the White Term Paper Tornado!

Does the Term Paper Tornado in effect cause mere destruction or does it have some natural benefits and worth? The Pro and Con staff shouldered their shovels and set out to sift through the debris, finding these reactions to the holecaust.

"Term papers just make a lot of extra work when we could spend the time reading class assignments and outside reading related to class work." So said Pam McWilliams.

Slowly regaining consciousness after a head-on collision with a blue '72 Smith-Corona, a freshman, John Sokel, said, "The papers that we've been assigned so far haven't been as worthwhile as they could be. I think 'thought papers' are more beneficial to the student." A group of other freshmen sighed and had to agree that most of the Writing Program assignments have been nothing but busy work.

Poking her head out of a waste-paper basket, Julie Harman told us us that term paper assignments don't include self-initiation aren't at all worthwhile. "You just can't get much out of it if you aren't intrigued with it."

But the Term Paper Tornado didn't mean complete disaster for Fredi Zwirner. She says, "All term papers benefit you a little because you can't help picking up some information from them. But if the paper was assigned just for the sake of assigning a paper, it's just not worth the time you put into it. If the paper does have a purpose, though, you can get a lot better insight into your subject and you can decide whether or not you want to continue studying in that area."

Then who should appear but Ron Honeywell, shaking excess eraser dust from his person. "Term papers aren't completely worthless. Once the research has been completed it might be more worthwhile to debate the subject verbally to examine all sides of the topic. Perhaps a 500 word paper would help us to improve our writing skills, rather than a lengthy term paper."

Sirens wailing, we sped to the next scene where we find the Term Paper Tornado to be more of an adventure than a disaster.

We stopped Debbie Kane on her way to Ellis Book Store to buy five more packs of 3"x5"'s and she explained that "Term papers are good and worthwhile because they give the student an opportunity to acquire detailed and in-depth knowledge of a particular aspect of his subject area. It also makes the student do more outside reading. But I don't think the grade on the term paper should carry too much influence on the final grade for the courses; maybe it should be used more as extra credit."

Dana Ono, proofreading for the seventh time, says,"You get a sense of self-satisfaction from a term paper. It coordinates your ideas and data so that you come up with clear conclusions. It adds more to the course. Besides all that, term papers prepare you for grad school."

With one last sigh the staff put the shovels away till next term when, unfortunately, the White Term Paper Tornado has already been predicted to strike again. So far forecaster Sonny McCloud has had a sensational 100 per cent success record for correct predictions. His comment on mere destruction or real worth of term papers was delayed beyond the press deadline due to an extreme shortage of typing paper at Juniata.

of wars in general and of this war in particular come thudding home to us.

And yet if the scene did no more than slap us into such an awareness its makers would be doing no more than any hack with a "cast of thousands" mentality could do. The really inspired touch in the sequence is the presence of Scarlett O'Hara. She has come to the depot to summon a doctor for her friend, who is about to have a baby. The scene that greets her in no way deters her from her errand: we watch her steadily, carefully threading a path through the wounded, and we realize that somehow she has failed so utterly to grasp the enormity of the situation that she is capable of registering surprise when the doctor at the makeshift hospital tells her that he can't go with her, that babies can come by themselves if need be but bullets and arms and legs must be removed with a physician's skill.

Scarlett has a tendency to concentrate so fiercely on her own purposes that she loses track of the context in which she is acting. We have seen this before in the film, have seen in fact that it is the key to her character: both her greatest weakness and, in a sense, the source of her great strength. Somehow the depot scene, where we see this character trait revealed even when she is acting on behalf of someone else, drives the point home more forcefully than any other incident.

That the social milieu of wealthy southerners before the war could produce people of such astonishing self-centeredness was one of the lessons of Margaret Mitchell's book, though she argued that the South was also capable of producing men and women of astonishing generosity of spirit. The characters played by Leslie Howard and Olivia de Havilland demonstrate this second part of Miss Mitchell's thesis. Howard's role is believable, but the character de Havilland plays, Melanie, is so sticky-sweet as to constitute the major flaw of the picture.

Another source of uneasiness for contemporary audiences, as might be expected, is the film's attitude toward blacks. In the book Miss Mitchell had time to deal in some detail with the curious social conventions governing slaves, such as the ability of "indoor" slaves to criticize their owner's actions if they pretended they were talking to themselves. The film throws out most of this social history in favor of Hollywood stereotypes, and follows the book in suggesting that the Good Nigras after the war were those willing to continue their traditional relationships to whites. Butterfly McQueen sukeys the role of Prissy up so much that Hattie McDaniel looks like Angela Davis by comparison.

Such drawbacks are comparatively minor though, set against the movie's general excellence, and I haven't mentioned yet the best reason of all for seeing Gone with the Wind. If you're puzzled when you hear old-timers grouse that there aren't any real stars anymore, then seeing this picture should clear things up for you. What they mean is we don't have Clark Gable anymore. This movie does have Gable though, and his Rhett Butler is sleek and sexy and altogether magnificent. If you've never seen the picture you really ought to go catch him. If you've already seen him, you don't need to be told.

Pennsylvania Ballet Company to Perform in Oller Hall

by Kim Hershberger

Grace, movement, and beauty will come to Juniata in the form of the Pennsylvania Ballet Company, which will perform in Oller Hall on January 31. This company has received excellent reviews in such prominent magazines as The New Yorker, Newsweek, and Dance Magazine. Young, enthusiastic and spirited, the company has established itself well in the world of dance.

Three separate works will be performed by the company. The first, entitled, The Four Temperaments is based on the medieval notion that all men possess four humors or temperaments which control their physical and mental states. This ballet is choreographed by George Balanchine, founder of the School of American Ballet in New York. Bagatelles Opus 33, with choreography by Patrick Franz, is second on the program. This abstract work should prove to be a refreshing contrast to traditional, classical ballet. Concluding the performance will be Raymonda Variations, another Balanchine work.

The soloists and principals, who will be appearing during this Juniata engagement, includ an impressive list of artists. Sonia Taverner has danced with the RoyalBallet in London, and has appeared as a principal artist with the Royal Winnipeg Ballet and with Les Grands Ballet Canadiens. Jean Paul Comelin, who will dance with Miss Taverner in Raymonda Variations, has been a principal dancer with many companies in Europe. Fiona Fuerstener, Kathryn Biever, David Kloss, and Hilda Morales are other excellent artists that will be performing here at Juniata.

The Pennsylvania Ballet Company was founded in 1963 by Barbara Weisberger. Though still young, the company is now, after three national tours and a week at New York's City Center, a well polished ensemble of thirty-eight dancers.

All Juniata students and faculty are urged to pick up free tickets for the performance at the Ellis information desk.

COFFEEHOUSE

by Henry Siedzikowski

On Saturday night, someone entering Tote would have found a larger than average crowd. The big attraction was Stephen Russell. The performance was one of Juniata College's coffeehouse series.

If it was to be considered as a coffeehouse, it might have been a little disappointing. The singer was good, but he failed to instill that feeling of togetherness in the audience that is the greatest part of a coffeehouse. Still, it was an enjoyable way to spend a Saturday night at Juniata College.

Gettysburg Downs Juniata Indians

by Tony Martuzas

I'll try to stay away from reporting like a cheerleader, but if I must report a game, I have a nasty habit of being honest. After beating Susquehanna last time at home in an honestly thrilling game, the Indians were downed by the Gettysburg Bullets, 103-77.

The Bullets were shooting very well and they actually didn't "control the boards". A good many offensive rebounds by the tribe went astray. I try not to make a habit of criticizing the officials, but the officiating could have definitely been better.

In the Juniata scoring department, nine games have Ron Straley first with 121 pts. (59% free throws), Tom Rinaldi second with 102 pts. (71% at the foul line), and Tom Griffin third with 80 pts. Tom Rinaldi is leading the team with 45 defensive rebounds.

During the Susquehanna game, Ed Podgorski was the surprise of the evening by producing a stack of points against the Susquehanna J.V.'s and Varsity. Ed, after 3 games, has 23 pts. and 13 defensive rebounds.

Miss Anne Behner, who spent this summer studying in USSR, will show her slides and tell us about her trip.

The evening promises to be very interesting because Anne not only studied in Leningrad, but also visited Moscow, Tbilisi, Kiew and some other points of interest.

You are cordially invited to come and I hope you will not miss this opportunity to learn something new about the country of which we do not know much."

Dr. Zimmerer's Frosh Seminar to Publish "Steady State"

Dr. Robert Zimmerer's seminar of thirteen freshman are currently engaged in publishing a book entitled Steady State, and we needed a survey of the Juniata students' attitude towards the current problem of overpopulation. I'll admit, the questionnaire was somewhat a disaster, because we assumed all questions were too vague, and we greatly appreciated the added comments on the questions. We should have used another noun for a male contraceptive, and Paul Lechevalier forgot to type a "2" (the most important part of the entire paper) on question number 5. Here's a rundown on the results:

Two-hundred and thirty students (119 female, 111 male) were polled, which further broke down to 159 Protestants, 4 Jewish, 31 Catholics, and 32 other (Buddists, agnostics, etc.).

Our first question was, "Do you believe that the world is in danger of overpopulation?" Two-hundred and fifteen students agreed, but only 198 thought that the U.S. was endangered.

Question No. 2 wanted to know if the student believed in birth control. 219—Yes, 10—No.

The next question dealt with the various methods:

	Yes	No	Undecided
Rhythm	128	85	10
Biochemical	166	46	40
Artificial	173	39	9
Abortion	85	118	20
Sterilization	101	101	18
None	6	172	34

Our next question dealt with Mandatory and Voluntary Control. Forty-seven believed it should be mandatory, while 168 thought it should be voluntary (15 undecided).

Now here's our main question, "How many children would you want?" It appears no students want a childless marriage, nine would like one, one hundred and twenty-eight prefer two, seventy-two want three, ten would like four or five, and we have eight undecided students.

With regards to "marital rights" (I have a nasty habit of using euphemism)

Often	114
Fairly often	87
Not too often	12
Rarely	1
Not at all	8
Undecided	8

We also asked which one in the marriage should be sterilized or use birth control devices. Twenty-eight believed the male should be the one, 130 thought it should be the female, and fifteen were undecided.

The eighth was extremely vague. We asked if Euthanasia, Infanticide, and Genocide should be used for curbing population growth. No one favored genocide, 63 believed in Euthanasia, and quite surprisingly, six agreed to Infanticide.

Question No. 9 was quite important. This question appealed to me deeply when I saw all those beautiful trees blanketing the hills around here (I'm from Philadelphia) and I know there's the space for the increased population — simply cut a great many of those trees down. There'll be the room. But why replace those trees with buildings or nuclear power plants? One hundred and eleven students would like to live in the country. If the population doesn't taper off, there'll be no "country" (of course that's a very firm belief of mine). Seventy-five want to live in the suburbs, 23 in a "small" town, seven in a city, and fifteen were undecided.

The last question wanted to know if the student was familiar with ZPG (Zero Population Growth). Only 136 knew. Which brings up this, a ZPG Chapter will be formed on campus (probably in March). I'll welcome all types of inquiries (and even nasty letters if you strongly oppose Birth Control and ZPG) concerning ZPG Inc., and the "population bomb." I can be contacted at 206 North-East or P.O. Box 1097.

Senatorial Elections Discussed in S.G.

by Patrick Minnick

Senatorial elections was a topic of importance covered at the January 11th Student Govrnment meeting. Lenny Stumpf was seated as Senator from the Junior class by default since no other junior cared to represent his class in Student Government. The balloting for the Sophomore elections was extended one day to give the Sophomores a chance to fulfill the requirement for a valid election which calls for 50% of the class to vote. In the same motion, S.G. also voted to leave the seat open if the requirement was not met. Candidates in the election were Harriet Moyer and Jeff Berkin.

Changes in the Student Government structure were debated at the meeting. In the future, responsibility of agenda preparation will lie, in part, on the individual Senators instead of wholely on President Jon Hunter. Agendas will be printed in advance and mailed to the Senators so that they can become acquainted with issues prior to the meetings and come prepared to discuss them.

It is possible that S.G. meetings will not be held on weeks when there are no issues for the Senate to handle. When meetings are called serious business will be handled and more work can be done by the Student Government with a minimum of wasted time.

An item of particular importance to the legislators themselves is the planned Task Force on Student Governance. Proposed in the Fall of 1970, this document is to cover all aspects of Juniata government from the Trustees and faculty to the students. Action on the proposal was necessarily delayed because of the faculty's overriding commitment to preparation for the new curriculum. Since this commitment is not quite as pressing as in the past, S.G. is wondering why no action has been initiated on the Task Force on Governance and drafted a letter to President Stauffer expressing their concern.

The Good Ole Days

Did you ever hear about it?

It happens every year: the Soph tell the Freshmen about the escapade of last year, the Juniors tell them both about the year before that, and Seniors, having none to check up on their stories, can tell them as freely as they choose. You know how it is—the time some fellows managed to push and drag a cow up the steps to Third Founders (though heaven only knows how), only to find that she wouldn't go back down the steps.

It was a dark and stormy night inside the walls of Founders when suddenly the tower bell began to ring loudly and without apparent cause. This happened not once, but several times, and trial after trial was made to catch the culprit who so destroyed the tranquil existence of the residents of Hogan's Alley (Fourth Founders). Well, to make a long story short, someone had managed to rig up a wire from near the Stone Church.

From another Juniata legend, it appears that one of the instructors on College Hill owned a Ford (in the days when Model T's were new) and, since the car was light and boys were plentiful and strong, the car got picked up. But that's not really the important part; what really mattered—where did they set it down? Well, all this happened at night and there was no one on Founder's porch, so rather than let all that space go to waste, they parked the car up there.

Floyd Roller: Important Man in Obscure Position

by Dave P. Andrews

The average Juniata student will save $12.48 this year due to the efforts of one man. Floyd A. Roller, the college's business manager and controller, accomplished the task of having the charge of the Pennsylvania sales tax dropped from the college snack bar, Tote.

Roller received permission from Harrisburg to revoke the charging of the tax after he found a "loophole" in the state code that describes the sales tax. The "loophole" concerns a section of the code which forbids charging the sales tax on meals served in churches and schools. After subsequent correspondence with state officials at the end of last year, Roller worked to receive permission from the Broughton Food Service. Following final state approval, the tax was no longer charged to students at the beginning of 1972.

Therefore, if a student spends an average of four dollars a week in the college snack bar, with the revocation of the six per cent sales tax, the student will end up gaining $12.48 this year.

However, this task of Mr. Roller is only one of many duties he encounters in his work that directly affects the student, but is not always evident.

Since his arrival to Juniata in July of 1969, Roller's hard work has given him increasing responsibilities over the past two and one-half years. In May of 1970, Roller assumed the position of business manager along with his duties as controller of the college.

"Budget" is the one word that occupies much of Roller's time throughout the school year. Beginning in November, Roller begins the preparation of the upcoming year's college budget.

One of his budget duties includes projecting a figure for the student's tuition charge. Arrival of the final figures obtained after many consultations with President Stauffer and other administrators of the school.

All of the student services, including the food services, bookstore, and post office, are under Roller's budget jurisdiction. A great portion of Roller's direct contact with the student body of the college concerns his relationship with the school's food service. He acts as a liason between the food service and the students. Roller is quick to assert that he maintains an "open-door policy" to talk with any student about the work of his office.

Recently, Roller has instituted changes in the college's procedure of student employment and student payroll. Beginning with the payroll of Feb. 10, students will no longer be payed in cash at the accounting office, but will receive their pay in check form. Roller has also installed data processing into the procedure of time reporting of student's hours.

Major Innovative Change in Theater Activity on Campus

Professor Clayton Briggs, Chairman of the Department of Speech and Theatre, announces a major innovative change in the production of extra-curricular theatre activity on campus. To accommodate a growing campus awareness of and interest in theatre functions by all members of the campus community, the Speech and Theatre Department is encouraging any college member—student, faculty or staff—to participate actively in open tryout sessions for performance roles, as well as contribute behind-the-scenes talent for any announced production. To bring theatre closer to the audience, plays will be offered arena style in locations suitable to works scheduled for production. By minimizing the production settings, more thoughtful attention can be given to the performers during the preparation stages. Additionally a greater diversity of play styles can be offered to the college community with greater frequency.

The new, innovative format will emphasize maximum flexibility with minimum emphasis on cumbersome technical support. The new campus community theatre program, to be called TOTEM THEATRE, encourages both Juniata College students and allied adults to enter into common production situations. To inaugurate the new campus theatre concept, Professor Briggs will be holding tryouts on February 1, 2, and 3 at 7:30 p.m. in Ellis Ballroom. Two major theatrical works, G. B. Shaw's ARMS AND THE MAN and Bentolt Brech's MOTHER COURAGE AND HER CHILDREN, are to be cast and placed in rehearsal in a tandem schedule so that alternating performances can be offered to the general public later in the Spring term. No prior theatre experience in necessary for participation, either as a member of a future cast or a backstage crew member.

TOTEM THEATRE IS TOTAL CAMPUS THEATRE.

Peace Corps Representatives Visit Juniata College

by Patrick Minnick

Representatives from the Peace Corps and Vista (Volunteers in Service to America) visited Juniata last Thursday and Friday, February 3 and 4, to inform students about the Government organizations and their programs.

College campuses like Juniata, according to Mary Bell, a Jackson State (Miss.) graduate, are of interest to the Peace Corps because they provide people with a background in math and science or in languages such as Spanish or French. The student with a degree in Philosophy or Sociology is not likely to find a spot unless he has other work experience or education which would fit into the overall plan of the Corps.

What is the overall plan of the Peace Corps? It is an attempt to upgrade the techniques of small, developing countries so that they can make use of potential resources available and improve their own living conditions. Agriculture receives the most emphasis since few developing countries have had an exposure to modern methods in this field. Education is the second largest Peace Corps program, but in fewer and fewer cases do volunteers go into a country and teach the children of that country, instead they teach citizens of the country who will in turn teach their own children.

Doctors, nurses, architects, engineers (civil, mechanical and electrical), and practitioners of the skilled trades, such as plumbers or masons are also needed in the Peace Corps, but are harder to recruit because lucrative jobs at home are more available in these fields than in agriculture and education.

How do you become a Peace Corps volunteer? You must be 18, although few people younger than 20 are accepted, and have a degree or work experience in fields parallel to some area of the Peace Corps program. More applications than needed are received (26,000 in 1971,

Mrs. Lowe Fills J.C. Elementary Ed. Position

by Scott K. Leedy

During the second semester of the current academic year, Mrs. Janis Lowe will join the staff of the Education Department to fill the vacancy created by the absence of Professor Miriam Schlegel, D. Ed., who has taken a sabbatical leave for the Spring term. Mrs. Lowe (rhymes with 'how') will assume the duties of Instructor within the Department and will be teaching two courses in her major field of concentration. These Elementary Education courses are: 'Teaching the Language Arts II' and 'Teaching Elementary School Social Studies.'

Two Juniata Faculty Return From Sabbatical

Two members of the Juniata College faculty have returned from sabbatical leaves for the fall semester. Clayton E. Briggs, associate professor of speech and theatre, studied contemporary theatre in London, England. Dr. Robert L. Fisher, associate professor of biology, conducted research at the Oak Ridge Ecology Science Division of the National Laboratories in Oak Ridge, Tennessee. They resumed teaching when upperclassmen returned to classes on Jan. 26.

During the spring semester, Dr. Miriam A. Schlegel, Martin G. Brumbaugh Professor of Education, will take a sabbatical leave to serve as a consultant for the Newark, Del., School District. She will study the new programs and facilities for elementary education which have been established in the rapidly-growing Newark area. Dr. Schlegel also plans to pursue post-graduate studies at the College of Education, University of Delaware, Newark.

Outlook Improving For '72 Grads

Ronald Shunk, director of placement, reports that the "employment outlook seems to be improving for college graduates. The Placement Office," he said, "has received information from various sources that indicate an anticipated upswing in hiring for the coming year."

Shunk reported that the College Placement Council recently circulated information compiled through a survey of employing organizations across the country. The results showed an anticipated 5% increase in hiring for the 1971-1972 fiscal year. Another survey, conducted by Northwestern University, indicated an 11% to 15% increase in jobs available.

This story is about my experiences in the United States. I have found it hard to be accepted by Americans, because so many people are not willing to open the way for newcomers in their own group of friends.

At first, everyone pretended to accept me because I was different. I could offer them something unusual because of my different culture. However, they wanted to know only about my country and its culture and not about me as an individual. Also, people were nice to me because they tried to prove to themselves and to others that they were not prejudiced against foreigners. Therefore, many people only got to know me on a superficial basis, not as a friend on a really personal level.

I feel that people should be more open-minded and willing to accept newcomers, because when they come to a strange country they need friends to help them understand new experiences. People should have more of an equal give and take attitude toward foreigners. Americans need to be careful not to take advantage of newcomers.

I have found that Juniata is no exception to the rest of the country. At first, it was fun here to be different, because everyone paid special attention to me. But later on, I was forgotten, since most people didn't accept me as a real friend. Now, it seems like I no longer exist. I am tired of being different . . .

Artist In Residence:

Ward Patterson To Display Archaeological Collection

Ward Patterson, globe-trotting artist, writer, and lecturer, will be the visiting artist at Juniata College from Jan. 31 to Feb. 12. He will present two lectures: "Sights, Sites and Insights—from Australia to Cyprus by Motorcycle, Boat and Back Pack", on Feb. 2 and "Behold These Stones: Art of the Fertile Crescent", on Feb. 9. Both lectures are scheduled for 8:15 p.m. in Alumni Hall, and they are open to the public.

Patterson will also display his unique collection of rubbings from ancient archaeological sites in Shoemaker Gallery from Jan. 31-Feb. 12. The collection is the product of five years of work in the Middle East, where he worked in cooperation with antiquities departments to make rubbings of ancient bas reliefs which adorn temple and tomb walls. "Rubbings" are made by placing cloth over the carvings and rubbing the surface of the cloth with a pigment to bring out the design. They are well known in Asia and England, but they have not generally been made in the Middle East because of the fragile nature of the carvings there.

Using a cloth and oil paint technique which he perfected himself for use on ancient stones, Patterson made rubbings in Iran, Iraq, Turkey, Tunisia, Libya, and Egypt. During 1969 he spent ten months in Egypt working at the Sakkara tombs which date from 2600 B.C. His work illustrates not only the art styles and comparative treatment of common motifs of the ancient world, but also illuminates the religious concepts, psychology and humor of the ancient kingdoms of the Fertile Crescent.

After leaving Australia in 1962, where he studied at the University of Melbourne, Patterson traveled for seven years throughout the Far and Midd'e East, logging nearly 65,000 miles on an antique motorcycle and visiting 40 countries. As he traveled, he worked in close cooperation with local museums and departments of archaeology to put together his collection of rubbings of ancient bas reliefs. He lectured and exhibited his work at embassies and USIS libraries.

A number of illustrations of his rubbings are expected to appear in the book, The Gift of Osiris: A History of Food and Dietary Change in Egypt by Louis Grivetti, et al, published by Vanderbilt University. He is also the creator of the "Adventures of Alan West", an adventure comic strip based on his travels.

A native of Ohio and a graduate of the Cincinnati Bible Seminary, where he received his M.A. degree, he also completed graduate work in English literature and drama at Fort Hays Kansas State College, where he received an M.S. degree in 1959. In 1961 Patterson was awarded a Rotary Student Exchange Fellowship to the University of Melbourne, where he continued his studies in English literature, literary criticism, and drama.

An active, ordained minister he is known among Christian churches for his writings on religious and adventure subjects, and he is in frequent demand as a lecturer.

Frosh Workshop To Present Three Plays

The freshmen n the drama workshop seminar conducted by Mrs. Doris Goehring, assistant professor of speech and theatre, will offer three one act plays as the final project of the term. The performances will take place in the Ellis Hall Ballroom in arena style.

On February 11, following the movie in Alumni Hall, the group will offer an old style melodrama using frequent vaudeville turns titled "Egad, What a Cad! or the Triumph of Virtue." The play was written by Anita Bell.

On February 12, following the movie in Alumni Hall, the group will present "The Wonder Hat," a commedia dell 'arte play with traditional improvised dialogue and masked characters.

A second play, "The Refund," will be offered the same evening to complete the series of productions. Adapted form the original by the Hungarian Fritz Krinby, the story describes the request of a former student for a refund of his college tuition. He had discovered, he said, that his education was useless!

Ear of the Needle

by Bob Kraut

Every year about this time, with unbridled anticipation, I wait for the February edition of Playboy to hit the newsstands. Without so much as a peek at that now-famous sumptuous and stapled sweetie, I plunk down my dollar for the misadventure of discovering the winners of the annual Playboy Jazz and Pop Poll.

I suppose there's a bit of the masochist in me, but being somewhat paradoxically optimistic as well. I expect each year the magazine's readership will exhibit a sense of musical taste that obviously is not destined to be.

Following as it does what is considered to be the musical poll of polls, that conducted by Downbeat magazine, thePlayboy poll reflects the musical intellect of its readers in a rather mediocre light. Rarely is an acknowledged master honored, and if so, it is on an instrument rather alien to the rock audience. For instance, Cannonball Adderly (alto sax), Stan Getz (tenor sax), Gerry Mulligan (baritone sax), and J. J. Johnson (trombone) won their first chairs, I suspect, largely by default. If one is looking for musical paragons here, one need look no further. As it is no longer restricted to jazz artists, the Playboy poll must be considered largely a popularity contest rather that a statement of musical excellence. Was Ian Anderson voted top flutist on the strength of his flute playing, or on the basis of his Fagin-inspired theatrics? I strongly suspect the latter. Elton John, a fine vocalist and melodist to be sure (although his stage name always reminds me of a British-made toilet) as ranking pianist, caused me to flush. And Peter Fountain's clarinet work is about as provocative as Kate Smith's body. Paul McCartney hasn't played any inspired bass/base lines since those verbal epithets leveled at John and Yoko, and Booker T.'s organ s about as understated as that of a eunuch. These are the

Dear Mr. Editor,

First of all we would like to say how much we all enjoy receiving the "Juniatian" and finding out what's happening on that side of the Atlantic. It's great to see the paper so "alive and well" again! Also we feel that the Junior Year Abroad is a really fantastic opportunity and we would encourage anyone with any interest at all to take advantage of this exciting alternative to the "usual college routine." The basic requirements are few: a "decent" scholastic record, 2 years of German or French at least ("competency level"); but moreover, an adventuresome spirit and a genuire desire to discover and understand the customs and people of a foreign country. You need not be a language major! Only a little more than half of us here this year have German as our "primary major." Personally I'm a biology major and there are also kids here majoring in English, political science. history, education, etc. Though it sounds strange, "science" for example, is not really bad at all in a foreign language since so many terms are "international". (Bio. majors: The bio. department and the medicine one are great here and there's so much to take!) If you already have another major on the way at J.C., you can probably get a duo-major fairly easily by taking advantage of this program; since everyone here takes a basic number of language courses anyway. (And with the employment outlook for college graduates today, having a double major is not a bad idea!) Regardless of your area of study, the foreign perspective is as much an educational experience as the subject matter itself. Poli. sci. majors, for example, might find Marburg especially interesting due to the almost fanatical interest in Marxism within the college-age group. Profs, in all subjects are very nice and try hard to be helpful. The work load is quite reasonable so there's lots of free time (imagine!) for travel, pleasure reading, gab sessions, etc. Just imagine spending Xmas vacation on a ski trip in the Alps or traveling thru Switzerland and Austria—as you wish! Most of us here in Marburg live in apartment house-like co-ed dormitories. We have private rooms with sink. There is facility to cook your own meals or you can eat at the cafeteria or on the town. (The tuition is paid to J.C. and then everyone receives a monthly food allowance back from this amount to do with as he sees fit.) As to cost you can come for no more than it costs to be at J.C. for a year. (As a matter of fact, this year it costed less than being there on campus including transportation over here!) Everyone is generally very friendly and goes out of his way to be helpful and kind. It's a tremendous experience we wouldn't have missed for the world! ! Look into it today! ! If you have any questions, feel free to write to any of us here or in Strasburg or talk to the Seniors who were here last year. Don't miss the chance! Vacations (for travel!) are quite nice and long too —two months for semester break! Buy a car, get a Eur-rail Pass, go hosteling—it's all up to you.

31,000 forecast for 1972), however if you become one of approximately 9,000 volunteers working in 60 countries, you will be trained overseas in the country where you will work for three months before the actual work begins. Training consists of intensive language work, cultural education, and technical training in your field of operations. A normal term of service is two years; although many volunteers sign up for second, third, and fourth terms, the pay scale is not calculated to make you rich, there is a lot of hard work involved; but if that doesn't turn you off, talk to Mr. Shunk at the college who has the new address for Peace Corps and Vista in our area of the Northeast.

Vista is an organization working in socially and economically deprived areas of the 50 states, Puerto Rico, Virgin Islands, and Guam. Programs operate in many different aspects of life where residents of the deprived areas need help, states Vista representative Richard Kraus, 1969 graduate of Juniata. Besides, social welfare, health, and mental health programs, there is a law program which attempts to give the poor man equal justce, and a small business program which helps businessmen with no formal business education operate more efficently. Vista volunteers cannot, however, enter an area unless there is a community action or similar group to sponsor them. Again, if you are interested contact Mr. Shunk.

Las Vegas, Juniata Style—Casino Night

Dr. Hunter takes advantage of the inexperience of an honest J.C. "Blackjack" player.

by Henry Siedzikowski

One of the big nights of the year was Casino Night on Saturday, February 5. Sponsored by J-Club, it gave everyone a chance to mingle with other students and profs. and generally have a good time.

The big thing was the gambling. Fortunes rose and fell with the toss of the dice or the turn of a card. But the entire fortune was in play money, with the big winners turning it in for the real thing.

Bill Carpenter walked away with $60.00 in the real thing. He won the $10 prize for being the biggest winner, and got the $50 grand prize since he was the only one to win over $100,000 in casino money.

There was a drawing for a $25 prize for those who won over $10,000 in casino money, and a number of $5 door prizes. So several people went away somewhat richer than when they came.

Food and dancing also had a place in the evening. Hot dogs, hamburgs and soft drinks were sold at cut-rate prices. A live band provided the entertainment. And there were loads of pretty girls around just waiting to dance with any guy who walked away from a table waving his winnings.

When you were gambling, there were plenty of tables to make or break yourself on. My particular favorite was the black jack table, and there were several of them around. It seemed though that the most successful gamblers were winning big at one of the variety of dice tables. They must have been right, since I ended up broke. But it was all a lot of fun.

From now on, there's a better way to buy stereo equipment at tremendous discounts than consulting a mail order catalog.

You just consult Fisher's student representative, instead.

He'll show you a catalog of Fisher equipment, and give you advice on the equipment that suits your needs. And, if you want, he'll arrange for a demonstration so you can hear what you'll be buying. Then, he'll process your order, at a tremendous discount.

Fisher selected this student because he is uniquely qualified to act as your Fisher representative. He knows a lot about high fidelity. He's a reliable person. And since he's a student himself, he knows what students need in the way of stereo equipment.

And since he's the Fisher representative, he's got what you need. Because Fisher makes practically everything.

near State College, Pa. As a teacher at such a school, she presented material which she wrote into specific units herself, and she taught her students in informal settings which were comprised of children varying in age and accelerating at their own individual rates.

"Due to a core curriculum where one theme or unit is carried out through all the subjects, and due to the fact that basic readers or workbooks were not relied upon for instruction, I had to do at least four hours of homework per night just to keep up with the task of preparing materials for the next day's teaching," she explained. "It was much more time-consuming than my undergraduate schooling."

According to Mrs. Lowe, there are a few districts within the Commonwealth which currently have functioning 'continuous progress' programs, all of which were instituted recently as experimental endeavors. "But these programs are catching on," she added. "And," she feels, "they are definitely indicative of what is in store for elementary education in the future."

When asked if she approved of this trend in modern elementary education, she voiced her enthusiastic endorsement. "However," she cautioned, "any student who thinks that teaching will require less hours of preparation than did his undergraduate studies will definitely not be a valuable asset to the elementary classroom."

Janis is a 1970 graduate of the Pennsylvania State University and she comes to Huntingdon from State College.

Mrs. Lowe's office for the Spring term will be located in room 306 of Good Hall (the former location of Dr. Schlegel's office).

Study Abroad — A Worthwhile Experience

by Adele Aboutok

Arriving at the airport tired and grubby from sleeping in our clothes, they herded us into big, empty shoebox-like buses, which, in clouds of sooty black smoke, carried us to the terminal building. Inside, the immigration official unceremoniously banged the stamp on our passports and hurried us on. In the baggage claim area, a scene of raucous chaos, we ran into a little grey-haired man in a berret holding a makeshift sign reading "BCA Strasbourg".

Arriving again, this time by bus, at the resident director's apartment in Strasbourg, we unloaded our half-awake rumpled selves and baggage. Shoulder to shoulder holding each other up, we posed for a group photo taken by some aspiring, young French news photographer. "The first group of American students has arrived to begin their year of study in Strasbourg." The invasion has begun!

Next memorable scene — one which brings you to the edge of nervous collapse. Suitcases in hand, director at side, you stand on the evening sidewalk in front of the apartment building which is to be your home for a year. Suddenly the door is flung open in a flood of light and of unfathomably high velocity words, your landlady has just greeted you. Dumb-founded into speechlessness, you let yourself be ushered to your room by sign language. Finally succeeding to stutter a malformed thank-you response with your tongue becoming painfully twisted in your mouth —you are suddenly alone.

Two weeks later you can't set your alarm clock when you go to bed at night because it's more than twelve hours before you have to get up. You're so damn bored! Nothing to do but study because you don't have a friend within 2,000 miles. And you wonder why you ever came.

A month later, being elbowed black and blue in the cafeteria line, you wonder if you are really where you are supposed to be. And if so, where's that?

In another month you amaze yourself at the ease with which you enter a store and purchase something. Amazing in that this strange language is somehow beginning to take hold of you. Plus the ultimate amazement of all—you discover you have made a few friends.

Two months after that you are banging your head against the nearest wall trying to understand the logic of the French mind.

By the time Spring arrives you are watching yourself emerge with the new leaves like a butterfly from the cocoon. Your old American self has disappeared, transformed itself, you see a new, polished self—down to earth, resourceful, fluent, at times witty and whimsical. An awesome sight, your own personal handiwork, you stand back and admire.

Then—a summer of footloose adventure, two weeks on the French Riviera or hiking in the Austrian Alps, a bicycle tour through Europe and England, or a rapid trip around Europe and as far as Scandinavia with friends met and made along the way. By that time you've earned your vacation as you have also earned—an indelible picture of a single gothic cathedral spire growing smaller over the red-tiled roof-tops as the train carries you away toward your former home.

What more can I say? Perhaps I should have entitled this "A View From the Bank. . .The Memory Bank?" I think not, maybe—"Memories of An Erstwhile Junior Year Abroad Student." Whatever you might want to call it, romantic or melodramatic as it may seem it's made of real stuff. And real stuff is what life is made of. And real stuff is what is missing in a Juniata education. So if you are hearing "The Call of The Wild," the call of the real stuff so to speak, take your life in your own hands and do something about it. There's no and's or if's about it!

Tradition—Part I

Students, you need something that may soon be lost altogether and sadly enough some of it has already departed.

So you want something to do or you are confused, or — Overlooking (little) things causes a loss of one's perspective. "Enjoying" and "doing" are the keys of life. "The failure of overlooking" locks the doors of life. Listening to a new song, noticing someone cutting grass on December 13, the gratification of studying well for an exam, — are life. There also such times as going to Jerry's Diner at 1:00 A.M. for scrambled eggs, pinochle from 5:30 to 6:30 P.M., and talking to a friend.

There is a bright future for Juniata and the students here. As a ship sails in water Juniata and its students need each other. When one gains the other gains, and in the end both will grow — though it may take you a while to realize it. A new curriculum and revised dormitory policies have been instituted by the college. It is the right direction. So give it time and keep the objectives in mind because the problems will be resolved. Go get what you want and forget about the minor difficulties.

Okay students are you going to let go of the good features which have been present all along? These are things to "enjoy," things to "do." This year has seen no Homecoming floats. Will you abandon All Class Night, May Day, the Raft Race, Mountain Day, Casino Night, et al? Don't lose them; they are important. Should you lose them you've lost a "spirit" of togetherness, of sharing, of doing and enjoying, of Juniata, and of yourselves. You will have removed a vital part of college and things you can appreciate only by participating. Lose them and you become people who live in one place and study in another. That's all, but not enough. There is more to life than sleeping and studying.

Perhaps by digesting this, you will discover that students (YOU) and Juniata are one in the same. Do something and you may realize this.

An Alumnus and a member of the class of 1972

Lime

by Edward Kinchley Evans

A hand shot out from stage right, waved frantically, and one of eleven straggly-ass members of a 'couldn't care less' orchestra got up and disappeared. The others went about their business like sleeping figures in a Paul Delvaux painting. The hand shot out again, and waved frantically. Another member got up and left. It was not a Delvaux painting; it was a play by Ionesco. . .where, slowly, rooms empty without cause or rational reason. Unfortunately, it was neither. What it was? It was the assembling of the Pennsylvania Orchestra on the bitter cold night of January 31 at Oller Hall to play for what is referred to as The Pennsylvania Ballet.

Oller Hall was packed to the rafters with even more seats being brought in to hold an overflow of courteous, excited, patient, and dressed for the occasion patrons of the 'Arts'. On the tickets for admittance was printed the time: 8:15 p.m.

By eight fifteen two men came out a side door and attempted to move a harp shaped case off the aisle leading to the stage. The orchestra was no where to be seen at this time. The audience watched with fascination as three men lifted and awayed with the Harp crate. A rumor flew by the window of my awareness. . .the orchestra didn't even show up last time. . .was it last time?. . .don't know. . .how did they dance?. . . . the piano player showed up. .oh?. . ah! As if summoned by the magic of the thunken word. . .a piano player appeared and went right off towards the piano. . .turned. . . thought better of it. . .and stood tinkling the keys. No sound came towards me. . .but it didn't seem to disturb him. So I figured he could hear better than me. . .or else he was searching for something other than sound. The audience waited patiently.

It seemed later than it was.

A fact was handed like a cold fish to me. They had asked for an extension of time and this had been granted. No one announced this to us but it had occurred earlier in the day presumably. Curtain at 8:30. My heart did little rabbit hops of joy. . .the orchestra pit was filling up with what I assumed were honest-to-God musicians. At this point that hand started to wave and we lost a few. Somehow, I knew we were in trouble.

Now, when you take on the name of a state for your performing group and the state happens to be Pennsylvania, a State founded by no less a personage than William Penn and containing within it's acreage some of the most majestical scenery orchestrated by God Himself, then, dear hearts, your performing group had better be Pretty Damn Great.

There was one dancer in this company of thirty eight car hops. She was a statuesque blonde that appeared in one of the opening Balanchine movements. She was in what is in vulgar terms the chorus, so I don't know her name. But every motion she made was fluid, precise, and ultimately feminine. The rest of the crew couldn't get past the first audition for the Radio City Rockettes much less the Ballet company for that Citadel of artistic Hash.

One of the distressing things about any Balanchine work is that in attempting to ignore the progress of the World and Times, he continues to interpret classical bal-

POINT BLANK

"Early Challenge to '72 Democratic Convention"

It is logical to assume that delegates to the Democratic National Convention represent just Democrats. But the Democratic National Committee takes a different view.

Last February the Committee adopted a formula for the 1972 Convention, which apportions 51% of the delegates on the basis of the Electoral College. Since the College is based partially on population, the formula, in effect, gives representation to Republicans, independents, members of minor parties, as well as people not even eligible to vote.

And to the extent that the Electoral College is based on state units, the formula disregards people altogether and represents geographical entities. As the Supreme Court has pointed out in its landmark apportionment decisions, this is tantamount to representing trees, rivers, and cornfields.

The Center for Political Reform in Washington has gone to court in an attempt to force the Democratic Party to change its current apportionment plans and adopt a formula based solely on Democrats. The lawsuit, now on appeal to the Supreme Court, charges that the present formula is unconstitutional and invidiously discriminates against large numbers of Democratic voters.

Under the Democratic National Committee's formula, the votes of some Democrats are substantially weaker than the votes of others. For example, a National Convention delegate from New York represents 14,534 Democrats back home, while a delegate from Alaska represents only 3,652. Each of these delegates has one Convention vote; yet the New Yorker represents almost 11,000 more Democrats than the Alaskan. The voting power of New York Democrats is thus severely diluted.

Specifically, an Alaskan Democrat who participates in his party's presidential nominating process has 3.98 times the voting power of a New York Democrat. (Other strongly Democratic states suffer the same discrimination. For instance, the Alaskan has 3.58 times as much voting power as a California Democrat and 4.24 times the power of a Democrat from Massachusetts.)

The Center for Political Reform contends in its lawsuit that the Democratic National Convention is an integral part of the presidential election process and must, therefore, conform to constitutional requirements. Drawing upon a long line of apportionment decisions, the Center argues that the Supreme Court has clearly established the principle of one man, one vote. The Court has consistently read the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to mean that the power of one man's vote cannot be diluted by the greater power of another's.

In Gray vs. Sanders, Justice Douglas explained the Court's position: "Once the class of voters is chosen and their qualifications specified, we see no constitutional way by which equality of voting power may be evaded." The "class of voters" in question for the National Convention is Democrats. And as noted, the present Convention apportionment formula makes some Democratic voters much more powerful than others.

The Democratic Party counters that the Center is asking for the impossible. How would the Party adequately define a Democratic voter? Is he someone who registers as a Democat, or votes for a Democratic Governor, or for a Democratic President?

Despite such protests, the Party has always been able to define a Democrat satisfactorily for the purposes of apportionment. Forty-six percent of the 1972 Convention delegates are now apportioned on the basis of Democratic strength—figured by averaging Democratic presidential vote in the last three elections. By simply figuring the entire apportionment formula on this basis, the Party could eliminate the discriminatory effects of the current mixed formula.

From a political point of view, the current formula underrepresents large urban (and traditionally liberal) states like New York and California to the benefit of small (traditionally Republican) states like Wyoming and Vermont.

In addition, the South—which gave only 25 of its 128 electoral votes to Hubert Humphrey in 1968—is greatly overrepresented at present. The eleven southern states have a total of 595 (Convention votes. Under the one-Democrat, one-vote formula, they would have 158 less votes—for a total of 434.

If the Supreme Court should decide that Democratic strength must be used as the only constitutional basis for apportionment, the 1972 Democratic National Convention could be a considerably more liberal gathering than now seems likely. As a recent article in the Wall Street Journal speculated: "Sometime in the next few months, the Supreme Court will help pick the next President of the United States."

Kenneth Bode is Director of The Center For Political Reform in Washington, D.C. He first became active in politics in 1968, working first for Eugene McCarthy and, then, serving as floor coordinator for George McGovern at the Chicago convention. In 1970 he directed voter registration drives for various antiwar candidates.

Floyd Roller

Availability of W-2 tax forms for students which show year-end wages can also be traced to his office. The office of Floyd Roller has acquired a new look of efficiency which is sure to make the process of student employment more accurate.

Mr. Roller wants it known to the student body that his office is not responsible for the levying of local taxes. The ten dollar occupational privilege tax that any student employee of the college must pay, is levied by the Huntingdon Area School District.

Furthermore, a new 1% wage tax will go into effect on the Feb. 10 payroll, which will affect all student employees. This tax, which takes 1% of gross wages, is levied by the borough authority and the local school district.

When looking at present Juniata, Floyd Roller expresses a concern about the damages to the buildings and ground inflicted by students. He reminds that "damages mean repairs, and repairs mean money." Much of this money comes indirectly from the student's pocket.

"Long-range financial planning" is one project in which Roller hopes to participate for the college's future.

Although the Juniata student may not know who occupies the back office of Oneida Hall, this office of Floyd Roller has a very important bearing on the life of today's Juniata student.

We are not on the campus, but we are not far away.

Pro–Con: Abortion in Pennsylvania

This week Pro and Con decided to go with a non-Juniata topic, although we bet there are some . . . No, seriously, we felt this national, or at least statewide problem had some relevance to the Juniata situation so we waded right in — Pro and Con: Abortion in Penna.!

It has become more apparent in recent years that the number of young women undergoing abortion are finally re-evaluating their ancient laws on the subject of abortion. Pennsylvania, to say the least, has not been a leader in the liberalization of abortion laws. Resultantly we attempted to sample campus opinion on the subject.

Right now the Penna. laws state that a woman can get an abortion with the signature of a doctor, psychologist, and minister stating that the birth will have harmful psychological or physiological effects on the mother. Special cases of rape or incest need only the signature of the doctor.

Mike Beck likes it the way it is, "As to legalized abortions in Pennsylvania I'm against it. I feel that there are better means of birth control today, that the two people should be intelligent enough to use these methods of birth control rather than taking living material from the mother. However, if it is a question of life and death between mother and child, go ahead with the D and C.

Pam McClosky would like to see the laws "liberalized more but not to the point that anyone can walk into a hospital and get an abortion. Of course it depends on the circumstances but the doctor's recommendation should be continued to be utilized."

"I don't think it's right for people, who don't want the bother of having a child, to get an abortion," said Iralene Jackson. "Yet I feel that we must liberalize the laws so that the victims of adverse circumstances (such as rape) would have legal recourse. Now, anyone who wants one will get one so we may as well liberalize."

Sandi Corry advocated definite changes in the abortion law. "The state should not make moral judgements. Therefore, it should be legalized so that a person should get a good abortion without receiving the possible poor treatment from an illegal abortion if she so wishes."

After finishing research on abortion for her writing paper and debate, Ellen Norton feels that "the laws should be liberalized to abortion on demand. Such as they are, the laws do not take into consideration the possible destructive economical, social, and psychological effects that an unwanted child may have on both its parents and itself."

Diance Evertson summed up most people's views. "All states should cut out abortion laws, and it should be up to the individual girl to decide if she wants one."

Last of all we asked Mike O'Neil whether the abortion laws should be legalized. "Yes, I do, but it's ironic that we, who spend so much time and effort attempting to avert death, also feel compelled to take life away."

winners! Often, the runners-up are considerable more embarassing.

Other choices of which I am obviously not pleased, would surely round out the entire poll. Perhaps it would be easier to list the winners on which I, and other experts, concur Buddy Rich is recognized as the world's best drummer, now that he is no longer begrudged that position by Elvin Jones, and Burt Bacharach — Hal David do indeed write beautiful music. However, the remaining winners are, in a word — losers. The poll, as a product of the "Playboy society" reveals that its readership is about as dedicated to the dignity of music as it is to the dignity of women. Why do only five black men appear in a poll that is established to honor the best in Jazz and Pop Music? Contrary to what radio and television might lead you to believe, jazz did wind its way up the Mississippi from New Orleans through the horns of Al Hirt and Pete Fountain, and Muddy Waters never wrote a rock masterpiece dedicated to the Rolling Stones or inspired by Bob Dylan.

American music owes so much to the black musicians that poll results of this genre are an affront to the intelligence of anyone who has seriously delved into the musical heritage of this country. However, I suppose it is ludicrous to lay the blame on Playboy and its readers for the racist character of the entire entertainment industry. After all, Hef's mag does promote black music in its record reviews, and valiantly attempts to rectify the farcial Reader's Poll with a Musician's Poll that speaks closer to the truth. Other media are however, woefully, even sickly, unaware of the black man's contribution. How often do you see Miles Davis, or a TV program? I recall the night Rahsaan Roland Kirk guesting on Milles played on the Johnny Carson Show, and often his set name was completed the usually loquacious talk show host applauded Miles' efforts with deafening silence. Or Roland Kirk's stink on the Ed Sullivan Show provided subtitles that embarrisingly flashed across the screen to identify, Rahsaan, Archie Shepp and their sidemen. The whole thing smakes with tokenism. Julia lives!

So the next time you see Al Hirt or Doc Severinsen clowning it up on the tube, ask yourself if they really have any thing to say musically, or if they're just standins for the vital black musicians who deserve a better share of the media's exposure? The entertainment industry hasn't really come too far from the days when "Her Nibs, Miss Georgia Gibbs" would put out a cover version of a La-Vern Baker hit for consumption by the white radio audience. Sadly only the names have been changed. Now they read: Tom Jones, Mick Jagger, Joe Cocker and Chicago. Frank Zappa — where are you now when we need you?

Juniata Days

compiled by Karen White

The following two articles were taken from the 1933 volume of old Juniatian issues. Hopefully the standards of the college newspaper have improved since these were published. The first excerpt is from a column entitled "What Do You Think," and appeared in the October 11th issue.

The question for the week; Who's afraid of the big, bad wolf?

Woodrow Middlekauff: "Yeh, I'm afraid of him: he might eat me up. It would be bad for his digestion."

Helen Bowling: "I am afraid of him. He is too fierce."

Clair Replogle: "He might blow my house down and eat me."

Clarence Rosenburger: "I'm not scared of him, there's nothing to be afraid of."

Harry Hummel: "I'll bite."

There were even more replies, but they really aren't worth including. You can get the general idea by now.

The next excerpt is from the column "the Tomahawk" on April 12th.

Hello Folks

Your old faithful friend Tommy is back on the job again after four weeks vacation, during which his best friend and secretary carried on.

The old Tommy with his senselessness, worthlessness, and as you might expect, his uselessness.

Tommy is very much in favor of the senior walking sticks, but they sure are raising cane.

Another riddle — Why is going to the dining hall Saturday night like having a blind date?

That's easy — you can never tell what you're going to meet up with.

Rave on. Tommy, Rave on!
Good night, folks, TOMMY

let which requires infinite discipline, a quality of the human condition that is as rare today as Faberg'e Easter Eggs. Balahchine gives to all his roles an androgynous stamp where in truth you can't distinguish the males from the females. In this company, in their one attempt to help us enjoy the evening by removing this confusion, the girls wore plastered down slick hair arrangements and the boys let their locks flow loose and wild.

The lead dancer (or so he was titled) kept jumping back out on stage in the final segment called Raymonda Variations. His name, spelled out in all caps in the program, is JEAN PAUL COMELIN, and he seemed uncomfortable in his white tights and satinized Prince Charming jacket. He was a clutz and no amount of mentioning favorable reviews from the New Yorker or Newsweek can change what I saw. He looked like a refugee from a Filling Station and would have been more at home in dungarees and a sweat shirt. Perhaps so attired he could walk to the car and clean your windshield without stumbling over his own feet.

Rather than trying to swallow the whole bottle of 'culture' at one gulp, wouldn't it seem that inexperienced groups such as this neighborhood endeavor would find works more in keeping with their time and capabilities? Works where there is visual excitement and immediacies which help cover awkwardness and professional naivete'.

It was not an unaware audience. Several people I spoke to after this disastrous evening, had seen the electrifying Joffrey's "Astarte", the foreboding "Night Wings" and the brilliant Harkness production of "Monument For A Dead Boy". Any one of which would have been less cruel than say Balanchine to attempt. After you sit down to play the piano with your one dollar course under your belt; no one is going to be too happy to see you tackle Wagner.

Post Script: Many people went to a great deal of inconvenience and time to attend this performance. Would be that those participating on the stage and in the orchestra had at least made the effort to conceal their indifference and patronization.

Ron Straley (25) moves in for a shot in Juniata's losing effort against Lycoming.

by Tony Martuzas

The Juniata Indians were again defeated at home, this time by a 110-82 victory for the Lycoming Warriors. Tom Smith for the Warriors was devastating with 39 points.

Downed by 10 points at the half, the Warriors quickly pulled away to a 20 point lead with Tom Smith's two foul shots with 15:21 left in the game. The remainder of the game the Indians just shot flat and the defense kept breaking down.

In Reading, the tribe was again humilated by a 102-60 thrashing from Albright. Albright kept coming back strong after every tribe threat to preserve their big lead. For the Indians it's the same story, the defense is still breaking down and the shots are still going astray.

Juniata Defeated By Wilkes And Scranton

by Tony Martuzas

The Juniata Indians played host to the Scranton Royals and Wilkes Colonels, bowing to the Royals 104-87 and then to the Colonels 97-73. Their opponents are still out — rebounding and out-shooting them on the tribe's home court.

In the first game, the Indians were down by ten points at halftime. At the 7:30 mark, the tribe found themselves on the short end of a 81-61 score. Scranton foul shooters were suprisingly accurate despite the heckling and infrequent screams from the fans.

The Indians played a much stronger game against Wilkes, but due to the great performances of Colonel frosh Clarence Ozgo, junior Mark Caterson, and senior Dave Kurosky, all the Indian efforts went in vain. Ozgo was consistently pulling down rebounds and at times he drove unmolested to the basket. Kurosky seemed as though he couldn't miss from fifteen feet out and Caterson always managed to find his way to the basket.

Tom Rinaldi for the tribe was tapping shots in and pulling down offensive rebounds, Tom Griffin was hustling up and down the court, and Ron Straley was highly accurate in his shooting. But it was not enough to catch the Colonels.

Dean Rossi Replaces Charles "Chick" Bunton

Dr. Wilfred G. Norris, Dean of Juniata College, today announced the appointment of Dean M. Rossi who will replace Charles G. Burton, Jr., Assistant Professor of Physical Education, Head Track Coach, and defensive coordinator for the football team. Bunton's resignation is effective May 31, when he will enter private business.

Rossi, who has an M.S. degree in physical education from West Virginia University, will be an Instructor of Physical Education and the Director of Intramural Athletics at Juniata. He will also serve as Head Track Soach and offensive coordinator for the football team. In addition Rossi will be responsible for coordinating athletic recruiting through the office of the Director of Physical Education, Walter Nadzak, Jr.

In referring to Rossi's appointment, Nadzak stated, "We're looking forward to the addition of Dean Rossi to our staff. He brings with him an outstanding record as a coach and teacher."

A native of Bellwood, Pa., and a graduate of Bellwood-Antis High School, Rossi graduated from The Pennsylvania State University with a B.S. in physical education.

After serving in the United States Army, he began teaching and coaching at Altoona High School, where he served as Assistant Coach of football, wrestling and track from 1961-67. During those seven years, Altoona High School had a number of outstanding football teams and players, including Mike Reid of Penn State and the Cincinnati Bengals, who played fullback for Rossi, the offensive backfield coach.

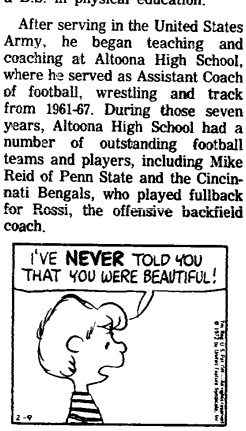
In 1967 Rossi was named head football coach at Derry Area High School, where his team won their last five games to finish with a 6-3 record in 1970, his final year.

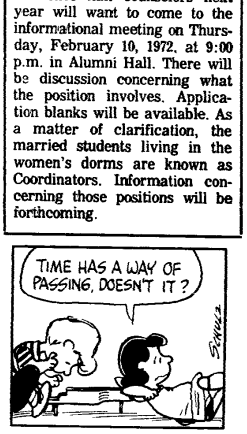
Dickinson College selected him as its offensive backfield coach in April 1971, and he was also placed in charge of the recruiting program. Rossi will remain on the Dickinson staff until the end of the current academc year.

During his four year tenure at Juniata College, Bunton has helped to mold record- breaking performers in track and tenacious defensive units in football. Last year his track team broke ten school records, and the 1971 gridiron defensive unit allowed only 8.9 points per game to rank tenth among NCAA small colleges.

Nadzak praised Bunton's coaching efforts at Juniata, "He is one of the hardest working coaches I've known, and he has contributed a great deal to our program. We hate to lose him, although he is going to an excellent business opportunity."

Students interested in being residence hall counselors next year will want to come to the informational meeting on Thursday, February 10, 1972, at 9:00 p.m. in Alumni Hall. There will be discussion concerning what the position involves. Application blanks will be available. As a matter of clarification, the married students living in the women's dorms are known as Coordinators. Information concerning those positions will be forthcoming.





Girls Take Second Victory In Basketball

by Vernne L. Wetzel

On Friday, January 14, the Juniata Women's Basketball team scored their second straight victory for the season over Penn Hall. The score was Juniata 42, Penn Hall 32. The scorers for Juniata were Vernne Wetzel, 12 points; Sue Hutt, Sue Rosshirt, and Tracy Keilblock, each 8 points; Michelle Campbell 4 points; and Nancy Agnew 2 points.

Juniata used a zone defense again. The zone served the purpose of forcing Penn Hall to shoot from far outside the key. Penn Hall also used a zone, but Juniata was able to penetrate it. They played thirteen members of the squad. Mary Ann Repman did not play because of an ankle injury from the Messiah game. She is expected to be able to play for the next game. Marsha Kershner suffered an ankle injury during the Penn Hall game.

There was an excess of fouls in the game, Juniata converted 8 out of a possible 25, and Penn Hall converted 4 out of a possible 16. Four of Penn Hall's starting five players ended the game with 4 fouls, only one Juniata player had four fouls. For all of the fouls, no one was forced to leave the game because of five. The first half of the game was played on short courts in Memorial Gym. The second half was played on the full court, at Penn Hall's request.

The next game is scheduled for Saturday, January 22 at home with York College. We are looking forward to our third victory.

Lakatos Heads New Corrections Position

Juniata College Dean Wilfred G. Norris announced today that Robert J. Lakatos has been appointed to the newly-created position of corrections educational coordinator. The position was created to support a program developed by Dr. Duane F. Stroman, chairman of the department of sociology.

According to Dr. Stroman, the most important purpose of the program is to provide improved educational services to the inmates of the State Correctional Institution. However, the coordinator will also supervise Juniata College sociology students in field work placements, most of which are in the area of corrections; and undertake correctional research with the assistance of the college students.

The Huntingdon County Commissioners served as the applying agent to the Governor's Justice Commission for funds for the program. They received a $14,810 grant from the Governor's Commission on Jan. 20 at the county courthouse.

The program will be operated by Juniata College. Lakatos, the corrections educational coordinator, will serve as a member of the college faculty. Juniata College and the State Bureau of Corrections will provide additional financial support for the program.

A graduate of Bucknell University, Lakatos received his master of arts in psychology from the University of Delaware in 1970. Since that time he has served as a correctional psycnologist at the Maryland penitentiary in Baltimore.

In 1969-70 he was a member of the department of psychology, William Rainey Harper College, Palatine, Ill. Previously, he taught courses in psychology for the University of Delaware Extension Division and as a graduate assistant for the department of psychology.

Lakatos is married to the former Angela C. Malanga, Wilmington, Del. They are temporarily residing in Sherwood Dormitory.

Steve Miller Rock and Rolls Ya In Memorial Auditorium

by Bob Kraut

According to legend, Steve Miller was born with a guitar in his hands, a hary (harmonica - for the uninitiated) in his mouth, and a wah-wah pedal on his left foot. Monday eve, Juniatians and guests, got a glimpse at this musical myth, and if my guess is correct, their appetite for rock 'n roll music may never again be so assuredly assuaged.

This concert was so thoughtfully and energetically attended to that I was moved to wonder if perhaps I'd made a wrong turn off Moore Street and had somehow ended up at the Fillmore East. Aside from the almost obligatory late start, (they're now accepted as the rule rather than the exception) everything was handled with such military-like precision that it helped to create an atmosphere of good vibes, so essential to the spiritual happiness of entertainer and "entertainee" alike.

Expecting to see our headliner right away, the introduction and subsequent performance of a jazz-rock ensemble "Christian" was such a pleasant suprise that I was sure my passions had been thoroughly satiated after their set. Opening a show before someone as "hyped" as Steve Miller has got to be an unenviable task. Nevertheless, this fledging group (I later discovered they had just gotten together before Christmas) displayed some of the most potentially intriguing concepts in rock music. Drawing from backgrounds as seemingly diverse as Coltrane, Ferguson, Bach, and Zappa, with a little more polish and stage presence and the time to coalesce, they should develop into a force to be reckoned with in the near future. It was a real coup to secure "Christian" and I'd like to hear them again, perhaps in a few months. Until then, the memories of their engaging music will remain fresh in my mind.

In contrast, the Steve Miller Band was a thoroughly professional aggregate, knowing they were the stars, and unafraid to strut a cocksureness that only comes with the experience of numerous such gigs. From start to finish Steve Miller was in complete command of the audience. And even when it appeared his grip might break, he was having obvious difficulty keeping his 12-string in tune, or when requests were postponed with "We got lotsa time", his cool self-assuredness allayed any fears that the momentum would reverse itself.

Backed by a supporting crew that believed itself to be "Santana", Steve vacillated between his electric Rickenbacker, his acoustical Guild, and later an open-turned Gibson Arrow without missing a lick. While his harp certainly presents no challenge to Paul Butterfield, it was good ole country blues, kinda nice to boogie to.

The cacophony that poured forth from those monstrous amplifier banks was first Jimi Hendrix, then Eric Clapton; now wait . . . it's Chuck Berry; no perhaps it's Alvin Lee; is he an Anglo Carlos Santana? I know — Steve Stills. or is that Muddy Waters in white face? Steve Miller was all these people and more. Such is the stuff from which legends are made.

GRASS ROOTS

Compiled by Kim Hershberger

Each week, the Grass Roots staff selects, at random, the name of a Juniata Student, and asks him to contribute an article, impromptu, concerning anything he chooses. What follows is the result of this week's chance soliciting:

"One Day"
by Terry Schroeder

"Arthur, how are ya doin'?" asked Robert.

"Pretty good today," said Arthur, "but I'm a little hungry, though; all the ants have moved. You wouldn't happen to have seen any of the little mongers run by here, have you?"

"Not a one," said Robert, "but let me think, I've got it! The garbage dump! I'll bet you'll find lots and lots of them, they seem to find better delicacies there. It's getting harder and harder for them to find picnics nowadays."

"And harder and harder for me to find them, too," muttered Arthur gloomily. "By the way, what's a garbage dump?" asked Arthur, rather uncertain of the term.

Robert looked at him with such a surprised look that his long ears stood straight on his head and his large, round eyes nearly popped out! Then, regaining his composure he said, "A garbage dump is a huge pile of stuff that those funny-looking animals on two legs throw away. I've often been there. Just over those fields there, and go through the woods, you'll find it, and the ants."

"Thanks!" exclaimed Arthur. "See you later."

"What's a garbage dump?" Robert muttered to himself as he began hopping toward the river. "That guy's been in the hills too long. What a crazy anteater," he said aloud.

"He sure is," cried a shrill voice from above. It was Grenda, the cutest little goldfinch Robert had ever seen. If only I were a bird, he thought.

"I was cruising over to your place and didn't find you, so I began heading home again. I happened across you so I thought I'd bother you awhile. Sorry I was eavesdropping, but I found it much more interesting to listen than to be polite," Grenda said in her

Freshmen Plays Prove A Successful Innovation

"Delightful" would be a good word to describe the February 11th and 12th productions of Doris Goehring's freshmen drama seminar. During the two evenings the Ellis ballroom echoed with laughter of JC students, as actors strutted to and fro across the circular stage, mouthing melodramatic lines, no doubt as much pleased with the way things were going as the spectators.

Punchinello prepares to sell Columbine a magic slipper while Margot looks on.

Friday night saw the presentation of two one-acts, "Egad, What a Cad!" and "The Refund." The former, a melodrama, consisted of two cleverly-woven plots. Bertram Oleander, a villian (superbly portrayed by Craig Manhart), poisons Augustus Greystone (Terry Tomasset), an already-ill millionaire, to prevent him from testifying in court and revealing Bertram's dishonest business affairs. Then, in an effort to get his hands on the Greystone millions (as well as some feminine flesh), Bertram cunningly convinces Constant Hope (Leslie Crabtree), Greystone's former nurse, that she is his long-lost wife—a "truth" she is unsure of, for she lost her memory when she was knocked unconscious in a train wreck. But Constant's heart belongs to Manly Rash (Jim Con-

Farewell Dinner Given To Honor Dr. Schoenherr

by Henry Siedzikowski

On Thursday, February 10, a number of Juniata students, faculty and administrators gathered at a farewell dinner for Dr. Charles Schoenherr, former Dean of Students. The "Chuck Roast" was sponsered by the Student Executive Council.

Help in Ellis Hall Ballroom, the agenda was based on the now-famous Friar's Roasts. Everyone first settled down to a roast beef dinner, with apple pie for dessert. Then, when the dining was finished, the evening's festivities began.

First, a number of individuals and groups on campus gave Dr. Schoenherr some "useful" gifts. Each gift, however, had some special meaning. For instance, to commemerate the way in which Dr. Schoenherr led the Juniata administration in wearing the latest fashions, he was given the First Annual Juniata Pretty Man Award.

Other gag gifts included a pair of wooden snow shoes, an empty beer bottle, with a promise to have it filled, and a lifesized sailboat, designed and built on the Juniata campus. It came equipped with an automatic wind machine, or an electric fan if you're not romantic. As a serious gift, he was given a pair of water skis.

To wrap up the evening, President Stauffer, speaking for the college, gave a short farewell speech to Dr. Schoenherr. Then, Dr. Schoenherr got up and said good-bye and thank you. At the close, he was given a standing ovation by those present. We all wished him happiness and good fortune in his new venture.

Amati String Quartet To Perform Sunday In Oller Hall

The Amati String Quartet, under the auspices of Franklin Concerts', Inc., will be making their American debut at Juniata College on Sunday, February 20. This is what a past program said about them:

"The members of the Amati String Quartet may very well be right in saying that composers, when they adapted the string quartet form, discovered their purest and most direct expression. They also claim that the seeking and recreating of this expression (in the course of which, as they say mysteriously, the performers are as solitary as they are united) is the most complete form of music making.

This likemindedness made them decide, in 1965, to investigate whether the four of them could carry the responsibility imposed by this type of music. Now, after

It is time to begin planning where you would like to live next year. Lists for the groups of eight in East Houses (plus two alternates) or groups of three, four or five for other special areas must be in the Dean of Students Office by Friday, March 24, 1972. Please remember that the twelve day vacation makes this deadline closer than it seems.

Sophomores, Juniors and Seniors are all eligible.

Blood Mobile Visit

Dear Students:

You probably have forgotten all about the successful bloodmobile you sponsored in December but those of us closely associated with this vital program have not forgotten, nor shall we.

The tremendous success you achieved in the first bloodmobile sponsored by Juniata College in a number of years is but another good example of the interest and concern of today's youth for the welfare of those in need. Your accomplishments should be a source of pride for all at Juniata.

To President John Stauffer, Mr. Will Brandau, Cricket Smith, Phil Woodworth, Dean Schoenherr and to the other college officials who made our visit possible, the Huntingdon Chapter of the American Red Cross extends a special note of appreciation.

To the many college students who took time out from their busy schedules to donate blood and to those who assisted with the program in any way, we extend our deepest gratitude.

The Chapter sincerely hopes that the students of Juniata College will continue to sponsor bloodmobiles in the future.

Thank you for a job well done.

Dear Ed.,

Now I don' know a heap 'bout newspaperin' en I really shunt say enythin' 'bout you high falootin' boys at de press, but I jest wanna tell ya I's a trifle puzzled at some o' de stuff Edwahd Kinchlay Evans been ritin'. It ain't like he ain't ritin' good—he rites real good. He follers a purty clear thought train en rites complete sentences wid all de subordinatin' clauses en not a lotta big words I don' understan'. I guess he made it through English Consequence.

Maybe I don' know enuff 'bout ballet eider, ta feel funny when I red mister Evans' articule in yore paper. I shudda jest thunk o' it as a smart guys opinion, en not let it bother me, even though I liked de show myself en thought dey cud get "past the first audition for the Radio City Rockettes" —some o' de girls enyway. Den I red de articule over agin ta see ifn I missed sumpin. Den I thunk if dis guy's ritin' a review on de Pennsylvania Ballet Co. he orter talk 'bout what goes into a good dancin' show en why de dancers did or dint do it rite. I guess I's s'posed ta know why dey warn't good en dint have "infinite discipline". I guess 'cause I's in college I's s'posed ta know dat when a smart guy makes comments dat seem stupid ta me, like "There was one dancer in this company of thirty eight car hops", it means dey warn't too good accordin' to de criteria set up by dose who knows ballet.

Den he says de orchestra's gotta be good cause dey's called Pennsylvania. I don' understan'—guess I really is a dumb shit.

Den he says Jean Paul Comelin was a clutz (I think he means Klutz) en "looked like a refugee from a Filling Station. .Perhaps so attired he could walk to the car and clean your windshield without stumbling over his own feet." Now dat really sound dumb, but den I starts thinkin agin en thought dat a lotta smart guys like to sit around en make dumb comparisons ta other smart guys en famous people—en dey laughs en it makes dem feel good. I don' know why dis is—en I dint know dey printed dat stuff 'less it's really funny. I mean de stuff mister Evans rote in dat articule wud be rejected from Hee Haw (I warn't tryin' ta be funny).

Ifn' you think I'm criticizin' his stupid comments yore rite, en I'll have ya know I'm a real expert on stupid comments. Enyone dat knows me'll tell ya I make up more stupid remarks in one day den most people makes in a year. But I don't know enuff 'bout ballet ta make up a dumb commentary 'bout ballet on my own. pretty chirrupy voice.

"Well, you see, Grenda," Robert replied, "I've moved from my old place. They moved a new car into the junkyard and completely destroyed my old house. I'm over by the river now, you know, right by the new highway."

"Could I see it?" Grenda asked.

"Sure, come on," said Robert happily, "I'm almost there anyway."

"You've got a much better place here than at the junkyard," said Grenda emphatically. "It's much more roomy and quiet." Grenda had no sooner got the last sentence out of her mouth, than a thunderous OUCH! followed by a parade of ouches, and bellows of "look out!" shattered the quiet. Robert and Grenda bounded outside to see what was going on. As they rounded the corner of the front of Robert's home a small pebble came to an abrupt halt at their feet. Breathing heavily and weaving with dizziness, he introduced himself.

"Hi, I'm Peter," he panted.

"Hello Peter," Robert replied, "I'm Robert and this is Grenda."

Peter nodded and began to explain his existence. "I was riding along comfortably in a tire tread, when I hit a rather bad bump. Well, I fell out and began to roll off the road, and just when I thought I was safe I hit a huge can, ricocheted, ran through a huge mass of paper and other garbage, and finally bounded off the road and ended up here. You should have seen all the stuff they leave along the road. It's terrible, a guy can't even find a good place to sleep without finding some sort of something laying around."

"That's for sure," Robert stated coldly.

"You think you've got it bad Peter, you should see what I have to fly through every day," Grenda remarked, "smoke, and dust and stuff, it's so thick that you can't even see through it, sometimes. Breathe it and you almost choke to death."

"Nothing tastes right anymore, either," said Robert. "Take the water, for instance, it tastes funny."

"Speaking of water, what is coming down the river?" Peter asked.

The trio rushed down to the river's edge to get a better look at the floating object coming slowly down the cloudy river. As it drew closer, tears filled the eyes of the watchers. The object was a spawning brook trout. It's lifeless form floated by now on its way down-stream. The trio turned slowly back toward the highway. Grenda was the first to depart and Robert helped Peter back up to the road. As Robert turned to go home, Peter said sadly, "Think it will be better someday?"

"I hope so," Robert said softly. "I sure hope so."

Ear of the Needle

by Bob Kraut

Dispensing with my usual format of an in-depth review of a single record album, I've decided to concentrate herein on four mini-reviews that fall under the categories of "Something Old, Something New, Something Borrowed, and Something Blue." To kick things off, something old.

Stevie Wonder's Greatest Hits. Vol. 2 Tamla T313L

Be forewarned, Stevie Wonder is no longer "Little Stevie", Ray Charles' protege. After all, he's now a strapping six-footer and a married man, so referring to him as "Stevie" is almost like referring to Richard Roundtree as "Dickie" — don't you do it! All stigma aside, he's Motown's most consistent chart maker, and this LP vividly illustrates why. Everyone from Lana Cantrell to 3 Dog Night is picking up on the tunes of Soulful Steve. Witness the magnificent "If You Really Love Me", one of last summers oases in the desert of radio boredom, or if you've ever heard "Never Dreamed You'd Leave In Summer" missed one of the truly eloquent ballads to ever surface from the Motor City. Then there are the classics: "For Once In My Life," "My Cherie Amour," "Heaven Help Us All," etc., etc., etc., At the age of 21 Mr. Wonder-ful has two Greatest Hit albums behind him while others are trying futilely for a hit. "The Wonder" is now a mature and consumate artist who would have become a star in spite of the canned magic of the "Hit Factory". So don't let that "Stevie" fool you, he's a big boy now. Look out Uncle Ray!

Imagine My Suprise Dreams Columbia C30960

This new album by Dreams is a sheer delight. While their first release was an artistic success, proving that the band's members "can play, brother!", it failed to ignite a spark within the proletarian record buyer. So eschewing all that impromptu blowing for some tight R&B cum jazz, Dreams has produced an album infinitely superior to their first effort in many respects. When questioned about how he unearthed the band's funky side, Producer Steve Cropper drawled, "I took 'em down to Memphis and fed 'em fulla grits." While that method is not recommended for everyone, it obviously inspired Dreams to subvert their individual egos for the greater glory of the group, much like a Stax soul band. Coming from various jazz backgrounds as they do, ranging from Horace Silver and Miles Davis to Chico Hamilton and Tito Puente, these are basically jazz cats playing rock 'n roll music. As a result, this is one of the best jazz-rock coalitions I own (and I own some) equalling or surpassing the best of B, S & T, Chicago, Chase or Lighthouse. But this band exhibits what only a handful of others can claim — a sense of humor. Tired of the maudlin self-righteousness of Chicago? Try this on for size. From the grotesquely great cover art of Gahan Wilson, thru "Medicated Goo" and the Freudian-inspired title tune, this album is a romp. Who says making a superb music can't be fun. Not Dreams, they've kept the spirit of Spike Jones alive and swinging.

United Artists UAS - 5535

Last year, Don McLean saw his initial release entitled "Tapestry" eclipsed by another LP, similarly titled, from an unheralded little Jewish girl — Carole . . . Whatshername. This year it appears that Don McLean will have to take a back seat to no one. His "American Pie" is a resounding success. And that omnipresent 8½ minute history of the musical sixties is the reason why. The names are all laid out before you: Buddy Holly, the Monotones, Marty Robbins, Dylan, Elvis, the Beatles, the Byrds, the Band, the Stones, Janis and only God and/or McLean knows who else. And while everything has been said about this epic, the rest of the album is sadly, being ignored. To simply frustrate those who bought only the 45, the album is integral to interpreting the single, especially "Crossroads" which is more meringue on the "Pie".

Don McLean is a "folky" in the best traditions of that idiom. And he, along with others like James Taylor, Joni Mitchell, and Tom Rush are elevating their material to the level of Art Song. "American Pie" is then a nostalgic glimpse of a slice of life, the taste of which will always keep you hungering for more.

Indianola Mississippi Seeds
B. B. King ABC Records ABCS-713

While this album is not Riley King's latest release I've selected it for review on account of the tasteful support provided by Carole King and Leon Russell, rock superstars that they are. Make no mistake about it, this is the "Blues Boy's" showcase, but for those soft-rockers who may desire a low-key introduction to the blues, this LP provides an excellent jumping off place. Somehow, all those lush strings are the perfect backdrop for the soaring King guitar. Everytime I see B. B. King, his head thrown back, eyes closed, coaxing those giddy notes from that regal cherry-red Gibson girl "Lucille", it sends chills up my spine. This gracious giant is singularly responsible for raising the rock consciousness of the blues, be it thru his half-brothers Albert and Freddy, or his white disciples Mike Bloomfield and Eric Clapton. One listen to "Indianola Mississippi Seed" will provide you with a sense of what it's like "to be glad to be unhappy."

Kvasir Returns; Solicitations Accepted

by Tom Alessi

Future Juniata students may look back on the 1971-72 year as The Renaissance. To add to the resurrection of the Juniatian, we, now, witness the return of Kvasir.

What is Kvasir? Ralph Church asserts that it is "the best in art and literature that the students of Juniata submit" and that it "could and should be an intellectual and artistic force on the Juniata campus." But Mr. Church is merely advisor for the effort. He is as much a spectator as we are.

The real organizers: the editors, Barbara Guhan, Anne Ross and Lynne Winter, feel that the magazine is a representation of the creative minds and abilities of the students. They are particularly interested in extracting works from shy people who are skeptical of their own talent.

This year's Kvasir is revived on a tenuous note. As successor to The Voice, approximately ten years ago, the magazine had been troubled by a limitation in its representation of and appeal to the student body. Lack of interest and scarcity of material resulted in its disappearance last year as well as its obscurity the year before. Despite the extent of the art work being accepted, this year yields another drought of interest and, most important, material.

Why is this? "A lot of people underestimate their ability" said Anne Ross and was promptly backed by Lynne Winter, who added "Everyone has potential."

What can you, as a student, do about it? You can express yourself in a play, formula, poem, artwork, equation, sketch, short story, theory (historical, scientific, political, sociological, economic, etc.), literary criticism, cartoons, book-reviews, satire, and controversial essays.

Selection, which will be based on quality of work and diversity of materials, will be made by the three co-editors. Submissions can be made by attaching an envelope, with your name in it, to your work and addressing it to Anne (PO Box 1349), Barbara (1261), or Lynne (1432). What's so hard about that?

The magazine, costing one dollar or less, will appear sometime in April but subscriptions will be solicited after winter vacation.

The editors, who do not want the magazine to be dominated by a small band of people as it has been in the past, urge you to contribute. They offer you the satisfaction of expressing yourself combined with the pleasure of seeing your work in print. Your only expense is time and effort. Try it, they'll like it!

Da Silva Prediction On Kidnapping Confirmed

by David M. Rieker

The recent kidnapping of a Spanish executive by members of a Basque nationalist group has confirmed the prediction of a heightened level of violence, made by Milton M. da Silva in a recently pub'ished monograph of Basque nationalism. An instructor in political science at Juniata College, da Silva joined with William A. Douglass, an anthropologist at the University of Nevada, which has a Basque studies center, to publish the monograph which was presented to the American Anthropological Association in the fall of 1971.

Da Silva introduces his study of the Basques with this statement: "However, if the recent events (trials of Basque nationalists in late 1970) cannot be interpreted as general approbation for Basque nationalist aims, it is equally evident that Franco's defusing of the immediate crisis accomplished little for the ongoing government effort to cope with the Basques' challenge to centralist authority within Spain's political life. Furthermore, it is likely that Basque nationalism will continue to grow and that the level of violence will escalate. This prediction follows from a consideration of the history of the Basque nationalist movement."

This statement is followed by a description of the current state of the Basque country in the northern Spanish provinces. The region is characterized as one of the most prosperous areas of modern Spain. The prosperity has lured migrants from other areas of Spain, and this movement threatens to overwhelm the 1,000,000 Basques who must struggle to maintain their cultural identity.

This constant struggle to maintain their identity is the major theme history of the Basques which follows. The Basques lost their political sovereignty in the Middle Ages. After centuries of futile resistance to the Spanish monarchy, the Basque nationalist movement was founded by Sabino Arana at the end of the nineteenth century. A cultural revival followed in the first two decades of the twentieth century, and the Spanish Civil War brought a brief period of political autonomy, but the Basques were soon crushed by the forces of General Franco. Many Basques went into exile to escape Franco's forces.

The monograph concludes with an account of the way in which the Basques in Spain have split into factions in their continued efforts to obtain autonomy from the Franco government. (The study was published by the Univ. of Mass. in October 1971 in a collection of research reports, published by the Department of Anthropology, entitled "The Limits of Integration: Ethnicity and Nationalism in Modern Europe," edited by Oriol Pi-Sunyer.)

nolly), the hero, who has mysteriously disappeared after Greystone's death. Manly, however, returns in the nick of time (yeah!) to save Constant from marrying Bertram, a fate worse than death. (Had you seen him, you would know.) Bertram is carted off to jail by Milly Smith (Luci Bromberg), a giggly FBI agent ("My name is Milly Smith, and I work for the law."), and Constant and Manly live happily ever after (Ta-ta!). A bit trite, perhaps, but nevertheless hilarious. Other roles included Ursala Graystone (Sue Hitchner) and a flighty Fowler (Nicki Simkins), the maid.

The second performance, a modern comedy, told the story of Clarence Blenkinsop (Fred Wulczyn), a former college student who returns inebriated to his Alma Mater 18 years after graduating to demand a refund of his tuition fees. According to Clarence, he didn't learn a "damn thing" at college, so he wants his money back. The school president (Sky Kellogg) agrees to refund Blenkinsop's money if he fails an oral examination which would prove he had learned nothing while at school. Of course, poor Clarence is outwitted in the end by the genius and cunning of his former teachers (Did you know the Thirty Years War was 7 yards long?), Betty Ann Berry (Joan Steffner), "Cannibal" (Luci Bromberg), a gracious geography professor (Nicki Simkins) and "Old Stick in the Mud" (Eric Severance).

Saturday evening the final one-act, "The Wonder Hat," a take off on the early Italian comedia, was presented. Punchinello (Mark Conti), an aged peddler, sells Harlequin (Brad Rudy), a braggart Romeo, a magic wonder hat, which when worn makes him invisible and enables him to hide from Columbine (Natalie West), a sweet young thing who is passionately in love with him. But the odds are evened when Punchinello sells Columbine a magic slipper which makes her irresistible to all men. However, Pierrot (Brian Maurer), Harlequin's friend, falls into Columbine's trap instead (good grief), and the result is hilarious, to say the least. In the end, the audience is requested to "go home and fix up an ending to conform to the state of their own digestion" by Margot (Pat Monahan), Columbine's "lady-in-waiting," and the actors depart, stomping off the stage in disgust.

As a critic, I can only say "hats off" to all three plays. And to Doris Goehring.

Environmental Defense Fund Brings Suit In Federal Court

The Environmental Defense Fund filed suit in Federal Court Monday, January 24, to require Secretary to Transportation John Volpe to fully consider the environmental impact of future Federal-aid highway construction.

Volpe is required by the Federal Aid Highway Act of 1970 to provide Congress this month with recommendations for continuing Federal-aid for highway construction from 1976 to 1990.

The suit filed in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia seeks to require Volpe to comply with the National Environmental Policy Act of 1969 in submitting his recommendations.

Under the NEPA, major Federal recommendations must contain detailed analysis of their environmental impact, including immediate and long-term adverse effects and alternatives to action proposed by the agency.

"The National Environmental Policy Act simply requires us to use a little common sense and look before we leap into another 15 years of federal highway construction without considering its impact on the public's environment," an EDF spokesman said.

New York Congressmen Jonathan Bingham and Edward I. Koch joined the suit. Each intends to introduce transportation legislation which they feel cannot get a fair hearing unless Congress is fully informed on the environmental impact of Volpe's recommendations.

These recommendations will play a major role in future highway legislation to take effect when current authorizations under the Highway Trust Fund expire June 30, 1976.

The largely complete 41,000 mile Interstate Highway System financed by the Trust Fund's accumulation of public gasoline taxes has created severe environmental problems for many central cities and surrounding communities.

In February, 1971, Secretary Volpe acknowledged, "Our obsession with the private car is destroying the quality of life in our urban areas. . . .it involves all of us in a brutally vicious cycle: more people, with fewer alternatives, means more cars—which require more roads— which take more urban and suburban land off the tax rolls and away from housing, business, and recreation while bringing increased pollution and congestion. This, very simply, is a self perpetuating disaster."

According to guidelines issued by the President's Council on Environmental Quality, Volpe's upcoming recommendations must consider downtown decay, suburban sprawl and related land-use problems resulting from highway construction in and around cities.

Specific considerations would include the tendency of highways to draw business, jobs and tax revenues away from central cities, destroy low income housing and increase air and noise pollution.

"With the National Environmental Policy Act and the Federal Aid Highway Act, Congress gave Secretary Volpe both a mandate and a unique opportunity to insure future Federal highway programs don't repeat mistakes of the past," EDF said.

Previous EDF lawsuits successfully forced several major Federal projects to comply with the NEPA including the Trans-Alaska Pipeline, Cross-Florida Barge Canal and the Tennessee Valley Authority's controversial Tellico Dam on the Little Tennessee River.

Business Intern Assigns Students To Local Concerns

The fourth annual Business Intern Program at Juniata College began on January 31 and continues until March 24, according to William D. Nichol, instructor in economics, who is director of the program. Four seniors are assigned to three local business concerns. The students will receive eight hours of credit and, in addition, will be in an advanced topics course with Mr. Nichol. They will relate work problems encountered on the job to similar problems in their textbooks.

The students are Frederick Murphy from Forest Hills, N.Y., who was assigned to the Gerbo Footwear Corporation; Douglas Martin of Willow Grove, who will study Miller's operations; James Yost of Rocky Hill, N.J. and Thomas High of Pottstown, both of whom are attached to the Owens-Corning Fiberglas Corporation. All of the Juniata students are seniors.

The program has been praised by local business and industrial leaders for the high quality of the students assigned by Juniata's economics and business administration department. Last year the recommendations of two interns at the local Owens-Corning Fiberglas plant were credited with saving the corporation substantial amounts of money. The two students from the Class of 1971 were Mark van den Broek, now with the Air Force Logistics Command, and John Hay.

Mr. Ronald Shunk, director of placement, says the "business interns are very popular with our recruiters." These students have an excellent chance of landing a good job, he adds.

by Edward Kinchley Evans

One of the gut-gripping fears that occasionally leaves me in a cold sweat is an abandoning of standards of thought by those in authority. Without the emotional touch of the Seasons, the vast chemistry of organized behaviour in the acorn does not function and life does not spread itself into the towering Oak whose fruits help sustain other life forms.

So, in places where one learns to utilize the great phenomenon of the human brain, if those areas of developing emotionally seasoned evaluatorial thought is gradually deleted from the curricula, then soon, we have a situation not unlike a totalitarian government or organization where indiviuality is crushed under a physically perfected, perfectly disciplined, computerized machine. People who are not taught to think for themselves, but with concern for the universal human condition, have their thinking and mobility charted for them.

If you are not programmed for institutional religion where basic morality is doled out to you like pink pills in a plastic bottle then God has forseen this dilemma and provided mankind with a more painful remedy. This Universal church is hidden under the pseudonym of the catch-all phrase 'theatre'.

To further confuse the Theologians, nothing about this particular remedy is either sanitary or virtuous (in the sense that corruption in high places is often clothed with freshly laundered white robes and the odorous behaviour of the righteous is perfumed with the incense illusion).

In our world, theatre people are notoriously ill kempt and their behavioral truth scalds the very ground they trod upon. Still, they walk under the protective eye of God, and if allowed, clean the Augean stables of Life for Him.

What cheers my heart this week is the announcement that Clayton Briggs has taken the ax of personal interest and with Doris Goehring has begun to hack a path towards greater theatrical activity here at Home. No Goody-Two Shoes these two. From the mind probing parable of Miller's "The Crucible" which we were fortunate enough to experience earlier this season to Bertolt Brecht's "Mother Courage" and Shaw's "Arms and the Man" which Totem Theatre will soon be allowing us to share.

Your enthusiasm in participating in this endeavor of Totem Theatre either active with the group or as an audience will like the magic purse of the Brothers Grimm open up worlds of riches to you and for you. The stronger the theatre is, the more the mind has to digest and evaluate and use for it's own development and happiness.

To protect our children from some of the harsher experiences of Life under the guise of 'for their own good' when we seldom have control of their lives (thank God for this freedom for them!) . . . is to create Vegetables of them for the rest of the world to feed upon.

Post Script: There is a line in Samuel Beckett's play "Endgame" where one of the characters 'Hamm' impatient with the slowness of thought evidenced by another character, in great despair crys out, "Use your head, can't you? Use your head. You're on earth. There's no cure for that!"

A little pessimistic, perhaps, but it sort of sums up what we've made Life all about.

Copyright 1971 by Jim Reif

You're at home with friends one night, and there is a knock at the door. It's two FBI agents. Would you mind, they say, if we asked you a few questions?

Do you know John Doe, they ask. Did you meet with him on the 19th of last month? Who else was there? What was discussed and who said what? The agents are only a few questions into their thing, but you've already gotten the scene.

You are sorry, you say, but you don't think you want to answer any questions. OK, they counter, but if you don't tell us what we want to know, you'll get a subpoena to appear before a grand jury. Good night, you reply.

About a week later, there is another knock at you door. It's the FBI again. This time they have a subpoena.

Under conpulsion you appear before the grand jury. After swearing in the United States attorney begins the inquisition: do you know John Doe? Did you meet with him on the 19th of last month? Who else was there? What was discussed and who said what? After the first few questions, you anticipate the rest—you've heard them before.

With slight variations this scenario has been repeated over and over in the last year throughout the country, wherever political dissidents are thought to be: in Tuscon, Harrisburg, Seattle, Boston, Brooklyn, Detroit, and Washington —federal grand juries have been convened in order to interrogate dissenters.

In a number of cases, United States prosecutors have asked long series of questions without the faintest idea of what the answers may be. These "fishing expeditions" are an improper use of the grand jury. Rather than present the grand jury with evidence already collected, prosecutors seek to discover evidence for the first time. Discovery, however, is not the legitimate role of the grand jury; under our system that role belongs to the law enforcement agencies of the executive branch—in particular, the FBI.

But the FBI has been singularly unsuccessful in investigating alleged criminal activity. The "Ten Most Wanted" has grown to the "Sixteen Most Wanted," and the Capitol bombing as well as the Media, Pennsylvania ripoff remain unsolved.

Therefore, the executive branch —which has never been allowed subpoena power to fulfill its law enforcement responsibilities—seeks to circumvent Congressional denial of the subpoena power by adopting as its own the compulsory process of the grand jury: refuse to talk to an FBI man, and you are shortly subpoenaed before a grand jury and asked the same questions; it is apparent that the list of questions asked by the United States attorney has been written by the FBI.

It comes as a surprise, then, to recognize that under our legal system the grand jury is actually supposed to protect the citizen and to be skeptical, if not downright distrustful, of allegations by the government of criminal activity. Historically, the grand jury was intended to act as an independent buffer, standing between the citizen and the government. Instead of letting the executive branch commence a criminal prosecution on its own, it was the intention of the Founding Fathers to interpose a body of citizens to determine, in the words of the Supreme Court, "whether a charge is founded upon reason or was dictated by an intimidating power or by malice and personal ill will." If the executive has insufficient evidence, the grand jury is supposed to refuse the indictment sought.

Disregarding this protective tool. The current rash of inquisitions is not unrelated. Almost without exception they are conducted by personnel from the Justice Department, rather than local United States attorneys. Uniformly the investigations bear directly upon the First Amendment freedoms of expression and association.

Sometimes the Justice Department uses the grand jury as a surveillance device. Instead of wide-scale physical surveillance or the use of informers to learn about lawful activity with which it disagrees, the Justice Department simply subpoenas political activists before the grand jury and "asks" them to divulge details under threat of contempt and possible imprisonment.

This technique often intimidates witnesses and their supporters from exercising their constitutional right

Wrestling Coverage

Dear Mr. Editor,

Being a junior, I have had the opportunity of reading "the Juniatian" for the past three years. I have no major criticisms of it. Its purpose is to keep the students and faculty informed as to what's happening in our college community and it does this for the most part. I have noticed one change, however, in "the Juniatian" that I read now and "the Juniatian" that I read my freshman year. It has to do with the coverage of the varsity wrestling team. So far this year there has been absolutely no recognition of J.C.'s wrestling team. Why not? Wrestling is as much of a varsity sport as football or basketball, but no one reading "the Juniatian" would realize that. My freshman year there wasn't a who'e lot written about the wrestling team but at least the individual scores for each match were printed. Now, if you want to find out the results of the latest match, you have to buy the Huntingdon Daily News. I realize Juniata doesn't have a powerhouse wrestling team but at least the guys are trying and they did beat Dickinson 46-6. The few wrestling fans at J.C. deserve to know how their varsity team is doing and who knows, perhaps a little recognition and a picture now and then in the sports section of "the Juniatian" might inspire our wrestlers to do a little better. I also realize that you probably have a limited staff and you probably feel that if I really was concerned about this, I would volunteer to cover the matches myself. Well if this is the case, I guess I'll have to be satisfied with the way things are because I'm not much of a writer. To me, it just doesn't seem fair to the guys on the team to have their school's newspaper ignore them.

Sincerely,
A Concerned Junior

P.S. By the time this is read, the wrestling season will probably be over, so maybe what I have requested should apply to next year's edition.

"I Never Heard of Steve Miller"

Pro–Con: Steve Miller Concert

Last Monday night, Feb. 7, the Pro & Con staff their trusty basketball in hand made their way through the snow to Memorial gymnasium to sharpen their I.M. skills. Dribbling around patches of ice we arrived at 9:05. But our entrance was blocked. Members of the Juniata establishment demanded of us $5.50 for the privilege of using our famed sports arena. Strange! But we needed the practice and continued on our way.

You know what it's like at a basketball halftime when you go from the gym to the lobby? Well, that's the way it was going from the lobby to the gym. Obeying the old maxim, "Where there's smoke, there's fire," a well-meaning member of our staff threw a bucket of water on the nearest match being lit ruining a good ounce of . . .(oh, we don't have that on this campus.) Dribbling around empty bottles, dodging flying frisbees, leaping over gigantic amps we had a fast break to the basket. But our extraordinary play was brought to a halt by a booming voice. We turned and found ourselves facing a guy in a red shirt, "Hey, I'm Steve Miller and you guys is messing up my concert." And it suddenly dawned upon us that the cheers, applause, and laughter which had filled our heads was not for us, but rather for another. Dejectedly we walked from the court realizing the "artist" had won one more battle in the age-old war between jock and artist. But sweet revenge is ours. This week in Pro & Con: the Steve Miller Concert.

The biggest problem in writing this article was finding J.C. students who had gone to the concert. Skip Ayres did and he loved it. "They were great. That's big enough entertainment for me. Juniata students just don't know what they're missing."

"I thought it was fantastic!" agreed Ken Tyburcy. "I particularly liked his jazz which was really good. I was sorry for anybody who missed this concert, especially people who liked music."

Sharon Chilcote liked it because it was "a different atmosphere from the usual, good for a change. It's fun to have a little diversity once in a while."

Gary Nyland thought it was good but had more to say. "You ask me about the concert? I'll tell you about the concert! When they say they're going to open the doors at 7:30, they open the doors at 7:30! It was cold out there." That was the general consensus.

Gary's roomie, Tim Turbett, had a lot to say. "I didn't think it was that good a concert but the audience received it well. There were so few J.C.'ers there. I can see having no concerts here next year. We've gotten questionaires and the minority which bothers to answer these decides for all of us who we will have. Juniata students should not complain. We're killing ourselves. We've gotta support the bad groups with the good."

Another concert-goer who didn't love it was Yeprem Mehranian. "I liked the way the people enjoyed it and the atmosphere, but I thought there was a lot of violence: jumping, etc. I didn't particularly like Steve Miller's music because I like easier going music."

But most J.C.'ers didn't go. Money and appeal were the two main reasons. John Owens summed it up. "The cost was too high and I don't like Steve Miller that much."

Mary White saw a problem in the concert date. "If the concert would have been held after payday for the college students, there would have been more people there. I would have liked to have gone but I just couldn't come up with the money."

The wrong date was Jeff Putt's complaint also. "I didn't like it being Monday night. I couldn't get my girlfriend here for one night so I didn't go. Had it been a weekend I would have gone."

But we think Dale Treese came up with the most typical, turned-in, on the ball, Juniata student type answer, "I never heard of Steve Miller. I thought they were an orchestra type band."

So another great concert passes us by and leaves us in an uproar as to its merits and faults. Maybe we just better leave the gym for B-ball.

Love Means . . .

Future Shock, the sociologists tell us. Future Shock? Never. We're suffering from Schlock Shock. And it all revolves around one word: Love.

What used to be so personal, private and intimate has turned into a merchandising formula for wealthy would-be poets and capitalistic couldn't-be writers who never have to say they're sorry.

Mass-produced love, like hula hoops and Barbie Dolls, is a new vogue. "Love is universal and love is an easy thing to merchandise," says the merchandising director of Paramount records. And not only are there bountiful banal books and multitudinous maudlin movies about the subject, but we're buying those books and seeing those movies. We're not being taken by it. We're taking it in.

We're allowing today's millionaire mod prophets to perpetuate old romantic myths that dictate the meaning and greening and, worse yet, how we can find Love.

In order to find The Meaning of Love, you have to play hockey at Yale, break away from your rich father and find a poor girlfriend who has leukemia.

You'll find it if you get rid of your bad breath. Or the frizzies. Or psoriasis. Or your mild case of terminal acne.

You'll find it if you buy the world a Coke.

You'll find it if you live alone-alone-alone with a cat named Sloopy.

to associate with each other and further political ideas.

The unnecessarily broad cloak of secrecy surrounding grand jury inquiries enables the Justice Department to abuse its power without accounting to an uninformed public. The case of Anthony Russo is instructive. Russo, a close friend of Daniel Ellsberg, refused to testify before a Los Angeles grand jury investigating the Pentagon Papers and was held in civil contempt. Later he told the court he would answer questions as long as the government made available to him a transcript of his testimony.

The judge agreed, but the Justice Department has refused to let Russo testify on that condition. The simple explanation for the government's position is that it does not want its shennanigans exposed. It seeks to hide its misuse of the grand jury as an intimidating tool, which now performs the investigative function that the FBI is unable to fulfill.

In Olde Days

From the Juniatian of February 6, 1946.

Only About Mice

Once upon a time, far away in Mouseland, there were two mice. These little mice were happy and anxious for a certain day soon to come. They were so thrilled; and so would you be, children, if you were going far, far away into a new land.

Not only that, these mice were going away to Mouse College, far away in Houseindon, Pa.

And so they went on fall day, and they dreamed of the day when they would be educated mice. No longer would they be bashful at the early morning socials and affairs of the mously elite. They would know just what to do on all occasions. They would be able to speak fluently and intelligently about all those things the really educated mice talked about. They knew they needed training, and here was the opportunity. How glad they were.

And so they came, one fall day, happy and hopeful. Self-conscious, and a bit homesick, but hopeful. And then the big party. The annual get-together party of all the old mice and the new mice. And their eyes were open, and their ears, and in some cases, even their mouths, but all in vain, for they learned not much. They were surprised and soon after had to wear funny little caps, so silly, they didn't even come to their ears, and they weren't allowed to go on the grass, and many other senseless things occupied their time. But worse than all, they couldn't even speak to the ladies, let alone learn to become natural and gentlemanly in their presence. They just weren't given a chance. They were disappointed and disgusted. And they simply had to try to learn all those things they wanted to learn all by themselves. And always they felt they weren't given a chance.

And they wanted to learn about the famous paintings, masterpieces in sculpture, music, and architecture. They so wanted to know about great men and women. They so wanted to know books and many, many other things. They did not get courses in Cat ways, History of Cats, The Obtaining of Food, and How to Live Economically. Of course they received their diplomas and were now theoretically able to cope with life and the cat, but wouldn't it have been fine if their Alma Mater had given them more? Wouldn't it have been fine if a really adequate, modern, and beneficial social program had been provided at Mouse College? And how the mice did miss those clubs which would have meant as much as regular classes, and more. Wouldn't it have been fine if a bit of the upperclass mice short-lived fun had been sacrificed in the interest of the incoming mice? I really think everybody would have had a better time. And the little mice would have been prepared to go out from the college into the intricate and complex ways of mousing.

Cardboard Love is enveloping — rather than developing — us. In poetry, in movies, on television, in alleged literature.

"i used to be in love with my teddy bear, but i love you lots more. . ." proclaims a book called "i love you" that's guaranteed to be so impersonal you can give it to anyone — your lover, your mother or your teddy bear. One dollar please.

"i used to q

Or Peter McWilliams who has written a slew of sappy books ("Come Love with me & be my Life," "I love therefore I Am," not to mention "The Hard Stuff: Love.") His books contain such hard stuff as:

first
I lived for love.
then
I lived in love.
then
I lived love.
now, with you I just love!

Two dollars please.

But their books read like Walgreen greeting cards compared to the works of the fathers of them all: Erick Segal and Rod McKuen.

Love Story: about a male student who plays hockey instead of hookey. About a coed who gets married and then buried. $5.95 in hard-back, 95¢ in paper-back please.

And Maestro McKuen: "If they could overlook my acne/ and the inch I lacked/ to carry them to heaven,/ I too could deal in charity." $4.50 please.

"Ron puts into words all the things I feel," said one girl I know who doesn't even have acne. She considers McKuen's prose-poetry to be good literature because it puts her feelings into words. But good literature takes words and transforms them into feelings.

McKuen and Segal deal in greeting card kitsch, but on a different level than the others. They manipulate us into wanting to believe that love is easy. Their works are read quickly, cried and sighed over quickly. They lead us into a fantasy world, where life is a love story, where loneliness is an additional pastime, exceeded only by leukemia and acne. And they laugh all the way through the bunk and to the bank.

Love Story has sold more than five million copies and was made into a successful (financially, anyway) movie. McKuen's books and records have earned The Bard more than $5 million a year. Not bad for a little love.

And what does it all mean? It means that we're desperate enough to find out the meaning of love that we'll go through one-night stands with McKuen and Segal, who have become Dr. Ruebens in romantic drag. everything you/ always wanted/ to know. . .

So what does it all mean? The answer is probably best put in one of McKuen's own poems: "If you had listened hard enough/ you might have heard/ what I meant to say: Nothing."

But whatever they meant to say, they say it over and over and over again.

Maybe love means you never have to say.

Grant to Dr. Erikson

When Work Looks Like Play

Tom Sawyer surely would have called it play no matter what a fortunate Juniata sophomore calls it. Tom would have given his approval to a summer spent in the Cascade Mountains east of Seattle, Washington and especially when it is paid for by the National Geographic Society for the purpose of studying the rocks which make up a large percentage of the earth's crust. Alan Williams, a sophomore from Mechanicsburg, who will accompany Dr. Erik Erikson, assistant professor of geology, on this summer's expedition to the Cascades should agree with Tom that "work consists of whatever a body is obliged to do. . .play consists of whatever a body is not obliged to do."

The trip to the central Cascade Mountains is made possible by a grant of $5,600 to Dr. Erikson in order that he may continue his study, started as a Ph.D. research project, of the igneous granitic rocks in that region. Dr. Erikson spent much of last summer in the mountains mapping and collecting rock samples. This past winter he made mineralogical and chemical laboratory studies.

The award is from the Committee for Research and Exploration of the National Geographic Society and Erikson and Williams expect to leave the campus late in May for an early start on the summer's work. Williams will assist with the mapping and rock collecting but he will also have his own geological problems on which to work, according to Dr. Erikson.

Selective Service Releases List of Proposed Changes

The Selective Service System today released a list of proposed changes in their regulations which will affect young men facing the draft process in the future. The changes — which were first proposed to the public for review in early November and now are amended after further study — concern procedures for personal appearances and appeals, among other major subjects. The proposed changes, scheduled for publication today in the Federal Register, are expected to become effective throughout the more than 4,000 local draft boards in mid-February. Until they become effective, Selective Service will continue its moratorium policy on all personal appearances and appeal board actions.

One of the major changes proposed today guarantees the registrant's right to request an appeal following an adverse decision at his personal appearance with his local board. Another proposed change allows a registrant who receives a long postponement of induction to receive consideration from his local board for deferment and exemption requests, including a claim for conscientious objector status. The revisions published today set a 15-day time limit in which a registrant must request a personal appearance or an appeal, but they permit the local board to grant an extension of this periods when a registrant demonstrates that his failure to respond within the 15-day limit was due to reasons beyond his control. The policy proposal that a local board give a registrant at least 15 days notice of a pending personal appearance with the board, the state appeal board, or the Presidential appeal board, also was retained.

Commenting on the 15-day time limit, Draft Director Curtis W. Tarr said: "Although we have shortened the time limit for personal appearance and appeal requests from a rigid non-extendable 30 days to a flexible 15 days, we also have added the requirement that local boards give registrants at least 15 days notice of pending appearances or actions. Thus, no local board or appeal board will be taking action in less time than has been required under the old regulations. Then, as now, at least 30 days will pass before any action will take place following the mailing of the Notice of Classification card to the registrant.

The package of regulations published today was the second major group of changes released in recent weeks by Selective Service headquarters. The major portion of these changes was first proposed to the public in early November and then effected throughout the System in early December.

The changes put into effect on December 10 included the phasing out of all new undergraduate student deferments, an increase in the time given registrants who receive induction orders (from 10 to 30 days), the establishment of classification 1-H as a new administrative holding category, and a major revision of the procedures and guidelines of the alternate service program for 1-0 conscientious objectors.

Carousel Goes on Despite Tragedy

by Scott K. Leedy

What had started out as an experience a few years ago seems to have become a tradition here at Juniata. And, in keeping with their recently-established custom of presenting a major musical production for the spring season, the Department of Music has announced their production of Rodgers and Hammerstein's widely-acclaimed musical, Carousel, to be offered to the general public on May 5th and 6th and again during the Saturday of Commencement Weekend (May 27) in Oller Hall auditorium.

The all-student cast is coordinated by the combined talents of producer David Bombaugh and his assistant, Susan Hockenberry; Bruce Hirsch, music director; Mrs. Marjorie Hirsch, stage director; and Judy Rosen, choreographer.

The play is set in New England and its action centers around the coastal villages of that region of the United States in the latter part of the 19th century. Billy Bigelow, the central character, and a carousel barker on the midway of a 'small-time' carnival, claimed his fame as a lady killer. His great appeal to the local maidens and his ability to solicit business for the carousel was the basis of his worth to the carnival. But when he fell in love with Julie, a local textile-mill worker, he soon found himself with an expectant wife in need of support. And, because a man no-longer a bachelor lacks a prime ingredient needed to appeal to ripening young lovelies, Billy was fired from the carnival.

Desperate for a means to support his newly-acquired family, Billy resorted to robbing a local merchant. But when his attempt was discovered, a struggle resulted in which Billy was stabbed to death. However, Billy was told at the Pearly Gates that, since his life had been so irresponsibly spent, he would be sent back to earth for one day to perform the good deed needed to gain him entrance into Heaven.

What follows is the account of how enough good can be brought forth from a life even as seemingly worthless as Billy's was to have a profound positive effect on the life of another. This theme is contained in the closing number, "You'll Never Walk Alone."

Certain roles have been double-casted in order to allow for greater participation in the musical by interested members of the student body. Featured among the female performers are seniors Barbara Hunt, Lynne Smires, Shirley Strock, Beth Wagner; and juniors Beth Coughenour and Debra Trotter. Primary male roles will be performed by seniors Peter Eisenberg, Steven Glass, Jody Harpster, Chris Huber; and sophomore Phillip Woodworth. Featured in the male lead of Billy Bigelow is senior William Dick, who is faced with the awesome task of stepping into the vacancy created by the tragic death of Walter McClincy, who had originally been awarded the central role. Walt had possessed the perfect combination of musical and dramatic abilities needed to portray Billy. And his death was a great loss to the college community and to Carousel. But Bill Dick has done an excellent job of following in Walt's tradition of living and loving the part of Bigelow.

Although Carousel will be offered to the general public free-of-charge, college President John N. Stauffer has authorized a donation to be given voluntarily at the entrance to Oller Hall by those who wish to do so and has directed the money so collected to be placed in a fund bearing Walt's name. The Walter McClincy Fund will be used to sponsor an award to be given by the Department of Music to deserving students who typify those ideals in which Walt believed and for which he lived.

Socialist Workers Party Arrive First On Campus

by David P. Andrews

Campaign '72 began its barrage on the Juniata campus last week, and the first party to come to this campus was neither the Republican nor Democratic parties. The Socialist Workers' Party, represented by Diana Tasciotti, campaigned for its candidate for President last Thursday and Friday in Ellis Hall.

Supporting Linda Jenness for President and Andrew Pulley for Vice President, Miss Tasciotti brought news to Juniatans of her "campaign of change." Juniata was the second college in a series of campaign visits to Pennsylvania colleges and universities that Miss Tasciotti will be making this spring.

"Offering an alternative to the present two-party system," as she terms her party's role in this year's elections, Miss Tasciotti gave her party and its candidates views on the major issues of this year's election campaign.

First on her list of issues, as would be expected of the Socialist party, was the changing of the national economy. The Socialist party calls for a national governmental control of business and industry which "would provide jobs for everyone." Miss Tasciotti explained that "society is now controlled by a small percentage of the people who get the wealth from the rest of the people and don't work for it."

Appealing to almost all conceivable minority groups, the socialist campaigner claims that Jenness and Pulley will include blacks, women, and other minority groups in their cabinet if elected.

Concerning women, she commented that "the Socialist Party will outlaw all abortion laws and devise more equal rights amendments for women."

"Black control of black communities," is what Miss Tasciotti said her party wants for the black people. Furthermore, she gave her party's view of the whole black situation by saying, "Besides, with the governmental takeover of education and industry, everyone will get equal opportunities, so there won't be problems such as busing." The environment problem can be solved rather easily by her party, Miss Tasciotti claims. She explains, "Corporations keep polluting because they must make money, but when they are nationalized, there will be no need to pollute."

When asked if these views are too idealistic, and not very realistic, Miss Tasciotti instantly responded. "We have already seen that the existing system hasn't worked, so why shouldn't we try an alternative?" she explained.

The two candidates for President and Vice-President, Jenness and Pulley, are both underage for the Presidency, according to United States constitutional requirements that state one must be thirty-five years of age for the office of President. Miss Tasciotti commented that this requirement is no hindrance to the campaign, since if they are elected, the majority of the people that put them in office will demand change.

When Miss Tasciotti was questioned of her views of her candidates chances, she responded, "Although we would like to win, even if we lose we are winners. As long as more people join the mass movement of which we are a part, we are winners."

The campaigner, Diana Tasciotti, is an interesting personality in

Dr. and Mrs. Crosby Visit Guatemala's Mayan Ruins

by Patrick Minnick

Dr. and Mrs. Kenneth Crosby were members of a travel and study tour, composed of persons affiliated with Wilmington (Ohio) College, which went to Guatemala from February 23 to March 5. The group of twenty was led by Dr. Robert Hinshaw, who did research for his doctoral thesis in anthropology at Lake Atitlan deep in Guatemala's western highlands. A few other persons of note in the party were Wallace Collet, who is chairman of the American Friends (Quakers) Service Committee, an organization that is quite active in Guatemala, and Dr. Herbert Zim, an educator and author of the Golden Books on nature, who according to Dr. Crosby "knew every bird in the jungle."

The group first flew down to Guatemala City, a Latin American metropolis of 400,000, which is best described as a curious mixture of the old and the new cultures. In one section of the city, the old colonial architectural style of the Spaniard conquistadors is very much in evidence, while in the newest districts of the city, buildings of the modern concrete and steel breed appear.

After seeing Guatemala City, the Crosbys' group went to the Lake Atitlan area where they spent four days at the Indian village of Panachel. They were able to observe the life-style of the indigenes, the native Indians of Mayan descent who comprise a large part of the Guatemalan population. The sole means of transportation over this rugged and mountainous area is by foot because the Indians do not have enough farmable land to grow food for any beast of burden.

Agriculture in this area is carried out at the hand labor level with only the most simple tool in use, even the plow is not among the Indian's farm implements. The Indian rotates the crops on his land going from corn, to squash, to beans, usually frijoles. In this manner, the fertility of the soil is maintained to some degree. Irrigation is practiced where ever possible, but in general the farming methods of the indigenes are the most primitive imaginable. Many families grow their total food supply on as few as three acres of land and are always on the brink of starvation.

Children work as soon as they are old enough at almost any task. Dr. Crosby reported seeing one small boy who could not have been much older than ten carrying a basket of goods for market up a steep hillside. When the boy passed the tour group, one member of the group had stopped the boy and asked if he could lift the boy's basket. It was discovered that the child's burden weighed approxamately sixty pounds. Other tasks sometimes forced upon the children by the necessity of survival are jobs such as making rope from sisal which is a way of making a living in some of the poorest villages.

After leaving Panachel, the Crosbys went to the market town of Chichicastenango where up to 10,000 Indian merchants and purchasers come to the weekly market from as far as twenty miles on foot.

Following a discussion of the Guatemalan national problems in Guatemala City, the tour group flew to Tikal which is near the Yucatan region and toured the

GRASS ROOTS

Compiled by Kim Hershberger

Each week, the Grass Roots staff selects, at random, the name of a Juniata Student, and asks him to contribute an article, impromptu, concerning anything he chooses. What follows is the result of this week's chance soliciting:

A cloud, white and fluffy, yet small against the ocean of blue. It fights for existence: it knows it is virtuous. The fluff gets a bit larger, then is covered again. The trembling hand of blue shoves it back into a corked bottle.

It seeps through: will it ever spread and grow? We hope so, for it is that which the sky lives for. It is lively and anxious, touchable, cotton-like. The blue hue finally accepts it although that cloud has created such a turmoil in the ocean. Then the sun and the cloud and the blue learn that they are only whole, together. The beauty is reflected and mirrored between them.

Juniata Offers Summer Courses at Great Savings

The 1972 Juniata College Summer Sessions will offer a balanced program of courses at a cost of only $145 per unit, a savings of 40% in comparison to unit costs during the rest of the academic year. All courses, during the first term (June 14-July 21) and the second term (July 24- Aug. 30) will be taught by Juniata's regular faculty.

Dr. Earl C. Kaylor, Jr., Director of the Summer Sessions, explained that the college views the summer program as a way to use its facilities the year round, so it subsidizes the students in the summer terms by charging less for tuition.

However, the quality of instruction is the same as that offered during the rest of the year and there is a wide range of course offerings. For example — the entire new freshman program is available with the single exception of "Modes of Thought and Methods of Inquiry." As a result, incoming freshmen may take the "Writing Program," "Seminar" and "Human Existence-Historical" in order to accelerate their education.

Of particular interest to upperclassmen will be the summer offering of the "Nature of Man" course, a requirement for graduation under the old curriculum.

Frequently the summer sessions offer students unusual courses not normally available during the fall, winter and spring terms. In 1972 a number of these are being of-

by Bob Kraut

Because rock 'n roll music is such a recent phenomenon (approximately a score of years old) and because it embraces so many diverse idioms, as the bastard of all, I reasoned it might be both fun and informative to put together a quiz to test your knowledge of this music of the counter-culture. After sampling a few of the questions some may dismiss this exercise as "trivia," but to anyone who considers himself a serious devotee of the music this is indeed heavy stuff. Don't be discouraged if you do poorly, this is merely a random selection and probably uncovers a few of my own personal biases, nonetheless I consider it to be a formidable task for any minor musicologist.

The Questions:

1. The Taylor family of North Carolina has spawned rock's greatest sibling rivalry since the Marx brothers (whose rocks were in their heads). Can you name the four Taylor children? J____, J____, K___, and A___.

Governor Shapp's Order Implements Environmental Improvement Plan

Governor Milton J. Shapp signed a consent order with the Bethlehem Steel Corporation which, in effect, represents a major step forward in implementing Pennsylvania's environmental improvement program.

"The order provides for the elimination of air pollution from the company's by-product coke oven operatons at its Bethlehem and Johnstown plants," Shapp said.

"Complying with this order will require the application of new and innovative air pollution control techniques through the establishment of a control program which will cost the Bethlehem Steel Corporation an estimated $22.5 million or more.

"I realize," the Governor added, "that the control of air pollutants from by-product coke ovens, with respect to available control technology, is one of the most challenging issues for the steel industry."

"However, what we have signed here today, which represents an amicable agreement between the Commonwealth and industry, should serve as a prime example for other industries to follow in view of our stepped up efforts to improve the environment."

Shapp said the consent order contains a number of unique provisions.

"It provides for immediate steps to be taken to reduce emissions and for a long-range, comprehensive control program, and also contains specifications and performance standards. The latter includes an outline of specific procedures and equipment, and establishes standards to measure emissions for various phases of the control program."

Signing the consent order, along with Governor Shapp, were Secretary Maurice K. Goddard, Department of Environmental Resources and John J. O'Connell, Vice President, Industrial Relations, Bethlehem Steel Corporation.

relics of the Mayan civilization. Archeologists have unearthed four Mayan pyramids, one of which is 219 feet high, and another which 150 feet high has been completely restored and was climbed by some of the tour members.

The most interesting factor of Guatemala is the people, however. Almost all live in the most abject poverty and have no say in the government except the very rich; there is no middle class. The political-economical situation is not likely to change without violence. A military regime is now in control of the country and denies the ordinary people the rights that Americans take for granted. According to Dr. Crosby, police are very much in evidence and they aren't carrying submachineguns for kicks.

EDITORIAL

When it is pertinent, "Juniatian" staff members take pen in hand and editorialize on issues they feel to be of prime interest and consideration. Each Editorial reflects the personal opinion of its author. What follows is this week's expostulation:

by Patrick E. Fleagle

Perhaps it would ease the minds of Juniata rock concert goers to know that they were not the only people to get the "rip-off" by the Steve Miller Band. According to David Harris of the Harrisburg Patriot, Lebanon Valley College was ripped off to the tune of a $6,000. loss. In much the same way as his Juniata engagement, Miller added insult to injury with his arrogant behavior.

Not only do colleges such as Juniata and LVC feed the rock bands' pocketbooks, but also their enormous egos. These bands must get a feeling of power by making hundreds of people brave temperatures in the subteens. According to Harris, the twelve degree temperature at Lebanon Valley caused a girl to be smashed into a water fountain by hordes of LVC concert goers trying to keep warm. That may sound cold but you should keep in mind that it was only four degrees at our concert.

The Steve Miller Band seems to be expert at adding insult to injury. Harris quoted LVC dean George Marquette in what might be the greatest insult on record, "They told me they wanted to take a shower in our gymnasium before the show — and if they couldn't they would go into Harrisburg for a shower, then drive back and start the show. Imagine how late that would have made it! I had no choice — they took the showers. We even supplied the towels." This stunt must have been enough to satisfy Steve Miller's ego because the incident wasn't repeated at Juniata.

Bringing upon us harrifying recollections of the Byrds concert, Steve Miller decided to show up five minutes before concert time and leisurely take over a half hour to check his sound equipment. At least most concerts include an apology for being late but apparently one was not in order for Steve Miller. According to Harris, Steve Miller's failure to apologize for abuses at LVC evoked the ire of student council social vice president Stuart Magdule. "I think that's what really made me sick about the whole thing — how obnoxious Steve Miller was. I think he enjoyed making the crowd wait. The band never apologized; they never tried to explain the lateness, they just didn't care."

Contracts seem to be the stumbling block in the toleration of the bands' arrogant practices. The bands usually get complete control of the program. Needless to say, this leaves the door wide open for trouble. But what's a concert-starved college like Juniata supposed to do? If the college tightens regulations on the contract the bands may not sign: subsequently, no contracts — no concert. Of course, if we keep losing $2,000. we might not even have to worry about contracts at all.

Any solution to the concert problem will most certainly result in a conflict of interests. Perhaps the solution should be put in question form. How far will the J.C. student go to get a decent concert and must he put up with humiliating conditions and exposure to the elements when he does get it?

Letters to the Editor

Letters to the editor should be addressed to: Editor, The Juniatian, Box 667, Juniata College, Huntingdon, Pa. 16652. The editors reserve the right to print only non-libelous and responsible content and to edit all letters and commentaries submitted to The Juniatan. The staff also reserves the right to publish all full signatures unless the writer can supply valid reason for omitting his name.

Dear Sir:

The incident with which this letter is immediately concerned occurred the weekend of the 25th of February, but is applicable to any number of similar incidents which I have witnessed for the last four years.

On Friday night of that weekend my companion slipped on the ice on the sidewalks in front of East Dorms and severely bruised the side of her face as well as her arm and leg. I called the head of the grounds, whom I informed of the incident, my intention to pursue the matter further and of my opinion that he and/or his subordinates were quite negligent in their duties. He thereupon hung up on me. He then sent one of the maintenance men to the dorms. The maintenance man sprinkled approximately a handful over about 20 ft of the iced area and left.

If this had been an infrequent occurrence it would not have upset me as much. However, anyone who has ever spent any time at Juniata in the winter knows that hazardous walking, driving and parking conditions are the commonplace situations.

In a time when Juniata as well as all private colleges are pressed for applications, it would seem that the administration would try to increase the attractiveness of the campus not deter from it.

Many people no doubt consider this issue a minor one and hardly worth getting worked up about. Perhaps it is, but if this letter has any success in removing incompetency, negligence and indifference from Juniata and improves student life it has been worth the time. I will only have regretted that I did not write it while still attending the school. Thank you.

Sincerely,
Raymond Thoman

Canyon Concert Receives Standing Ovation In Oller Hall

by Deb Kane

On March 10, Juniata College Center Board sponsored "Canyon" in concert. The group consisted of Rick Hamilton playing 12 string guitar, Bill Russell, 6 string guitar, Ralph Mason on cello, Doug Dixon on bass and finally, Juniata's own Carlos Alejandro on flute. Their performance, consisting of mostly original works had a tremendous affect on their audience. Other arrangements such as "Titanic" written by Jamie Brockett and "Today" which was done with the use of echos received great applause from the spellbound audience. "Canyon" concluded the evening with "Boogie", a 20 minute jam session which received a standing ovation.

The concert, which was held for the benefit of Easter Seals, was successful in raising $200 for charity and providing Juniata students with excellent entertainment.

by Rick Mitz

There's a new music — newer than Joni Mitchell, American Pie, the Taylor Family, and Mrs. King's rock Queen Carole.

There's a new neon-lighted music that makes Janis Joplin seem like just another pretty voice and makes Frank Zappa the boy next door.

This new multi-dimensional music is gaining impetus like the sound of umbilical cords snapping all around the country.

In an era of environmental health, health foods and mental health, it's only natural that there should be Health Music.

Music often has been used as a means toward health. For more than twenty years, psychologists have used music as a tool in treatment of mentally handicapped patients. Opera is well-known for its Mad Scenes. And many songs — from Deutschland Uber Alles to On, Wisconsin — have provoked an emotional reaction in their listeners. But now, music is changing its tune.

Two new songwriters are writing creatively cathartic music as they revel and reveal through musically "meaningful" experiences.

It all began about five years ago with Arthur Janov's controversial Primal Scream therapy. Neurosis, Janov says, is frozen childhood pain. All neuroses are symptoms for releasing that Primal Pain, brought about by unfulfilling childhood experiences relating to parents. He points to a single cure: The neurotic person must dismantle his defenses and return to where he made the decisions to act out expectations of others rather than his own feelings. Janov's theory is complex but, briefly, the Primal patient must re-live pain to remove the "curse" in order to understand his neurotic tensions. Naturally, Mother and Father are an intregal part of the therapy. The Primal patient is urged to call out his parents and, as he does so, the patient often begins screaming long and sorrowful sobs. This is the Primal Scream.

But now, Primal Scream Mothers and Fathers have found their way to the phonograph. Dr. Janov's best-known patient is John Lennon, former Beatle. Lennon's latest two albums underscore his therapeutic involvements. In a song called "Mother," he musically writhes in pain, screaming: "Mother, you had me, but I never had you/ I wanted you, but you didn't want me . . . Good-byeee." He ends the album with a short and snappy song to the tune of Three Blind Mice: "My Mummy's dead/ I can't get it through my head/ I can't explain/ so much pain/ my Mummy's dead."

In hi album, Lennon has creatively attempted to work out his Mother Thing, yelling at and for her at the beginning of the record . . .putting her to rest forever at the end. There is a blurred photograph of Lennon as a young boy on the album cover.

Dory Previn's music is of the same genre. When her husband, Andre Previn, left her for Mia Farrow, Dory's psyche cracked. She was institutionalized. "While I was in the hospital," she has said, "I started writing to get some order out of chaos. What I've tried to do is bring the madness out in the open."

And she's succeeded. Maybe too well. Her three albums contain more Mad Songs than all opera combined. In one song, she relives her four-month long sanitarium experience. But mostly she sings about her parents.

"Damn you, Mother/how I hate you/you will never know how deep/ I must cling till you release me/I could kill you in your sleep/I would smile to watch your life blood creep across your wretched hair yes, of course I love you, Mother/I'll never leave you . . . I swear."

But behind each element of Dory's madness is an element of sadness that passes through the listener's ears and straight to the heart.

This song is dedicated to her father: "The telephone rang/my sister calling/Dad is dead?/when did it happen?/six a.m. she said/ did he ask for me?/what did you say? never mind. . . God is kind."

Down by the railroad rtacks, as if abandoned by time, squats the remains of a fine and fashionable Hotel. Nerves now shattered by the continual neglect of the passing trains that no longer stop, it has become the refuge of those souls who wait only for the Dark Angle to come try their door.

Rather tired of the truck stop dining places around here where food tastes as if it were prepared from cans opened in advance of their need, I occasioned to pass this Hotel and sought a place at their dining stall. As the main room was barred to the public due to a catered affair, I ate in the little room off the side street. Seated around me were figures from my past. . . a man, having finished his meal, got up after being called by name by the waitress, and limping to the door on the way back to his room, which was at Avenue B and 12th Street, New York City where on a summer night while hurrying back after seeing Ron Tavel's Theatre of the Ridiculous, one was appalled at the maimed and crippled who huddled silently in the doorways trying to end the day with as little pain and effort as possible. He was passed by an elegant little woman, dressed as if for an evening dance, who quietly took her seat and ordered her meal, trying to eek out the moments as long as possible to make her day that much more meaningful.

Then, I noticed, across the room, sitting by herself, a girl in her fifties. Rather plain, high forehead, huge tear swept eyes, and nervously smoking a cigarette, she was staring straight ahead, a cup of coffee before her. Her hair was combed back and caught with a couple of bobby pins. It was as if she had freshly showered before coming down to eat to wash away the grayness of the skin and the need for another drink, which was possessing every thought, knowing that a certain amount of time must be alloted to the charade of eating. I became heartsick.

The last time I had seen that condition I was on a bus in New York City riding down East 12th Street and had passed the Hotel St. George. Sitting on it's crumbling steps, catching the last remnants of the morning sun before the lofts shadowed them away, was what was left of a delightful soul who went by the name of Esther Phillips, an artist who was blind, or nearly blind. She could still see enough to move cautiously through her day, from her one room in the old hotel to the corner for coffee and a greasy doughnut, back to the stars for a bit of sun and street life, and then the return to the four walls and never ending spans of time.

I had known Esther when she was alive and had sight and lived only to be up and painting. Before dawn, we would be up and with our paints and canvas and be off to Coney so that we would be well into our scenes before the crowds came. Or, we would be happily eating a hot dog for breakfast on the almost deserted trip over to Staten Island on the Ferry at seven a.m., having to wade through the crowds coming to New York City to work, while we caught one of the buses and rode to a favorite haunt (a ship's graveyard) where we might paint all day unmolested except for an occasional curious sea gull.

Esther had been educated at Carnegie Teck and already having

POINT BLANK

Copyright 1971 by Andrew Shapiro

Last night I accompanied a young client to his draft board hearing. As a lawyer I was, of course, barred from the hearing itself; Selective Service has long since stowed the Sixth Amendment in its dead file.

While my client parried with the board members alone, I remained in the outer office talking with the clerk. She is regarded by the board as the fountainhead of legal learning, so it seemed advisable to present my client's case to her.

The case couldn't have been more straightforward. Indeed, I showed the clerk copies of decisions by the federal courts consistently upholding my client's position against that espoused by Selective Service.

After my ardent appeal, the clerk looked up from her careful, gum-chewing deliberation: "Well, I don't know, Mr. Shapiro," she apologized, "my Supervisor says we're not authorized to follow the courts."

So it goes.

After three years of practising draft law, I have come to admire the Selective Service System as one of the purest forms of arbitrary rule extant. Within this amorphous setting, the draft lawyer's victories are pyrrhic. He has his day in court—but no more. Because the precedents set by judges are never translated into policy by draft boards; or if they are, the legal clout is lost in translation.

Take the monumental safeguards for conscientious objectors recently erected by the Supreme Court. Right now they are being dismantled through a new questionnaire for C.O.'s just proposed by Draft Director Curtis Tarr. The new SSS Form 150 would increase the present four questions to, at least, twenty-two, and many of these are as intimidating as they are unauthorized.

For instance, the C.O. seeking exemption under the liberalized standards of Welsh v. United States is asked: "Demonstrate to the board that your beliefs are more than a personal moral code. Are they held by others?"

The implication seems to be that there is something disqualifying about a "personal moral code" not shared by others. This implication is false and misleading. The Supreme Court clearly ruled that a personal moral code, if deeply held, is a sound basis for exemption.

The SSS 150 Form would also be revised to inquire: "A man who has a valid claim for conscientious objection may have serious reservations about his nation's political or sociological policies. If you have such reservations, how can you be certain that they have not been the primary reason guiding you to make the claim of conscientious objection?"

Tough question? On its face, yes; but not if you knew that Welsh v. United States ruled that the C.O. exemption does not "exclude those who hold strong beliefs about our domestic and foreign affairs or even those whose conscientious objection to participation in all wars is founded to a substantial extent upon considerations of public policy."

Indeed, the vindicated Elliott Welsh, himself, wrote his draft board:"I can only act according to what I am and what I see. And I see that the military complex wastes both human and material resources, that it fosters disregard for (what I consider to be a paramount concern) human needs and ends; I see that the means we employ to 'defend our 'way of life' profoundly change that way of life. I see that in our failure to economic realities of the world, we, as a nation, fail our responsibility as a nation."

The proposed C.O. form is also seriously misleading on the relevance of a willingness to use force: "A person's willingness to defend himself, members of his family, or his immediate associates may be consistent with a valid claim for conscientious objection. Are there any other instances in which you believe that forceful acts on your part are justified? Have you ever been convicted of a crime involving physical force or violence?"

These inquiries imply that use of force may adversely affect a C.O. decision. But the courts have consistently held: "The statute. . . does not speak of objection to force, but rather of conscientious objection to 'participation in war in any form.' . . .Agreement that force can be used to restrain wrongdoing, especially as the last alternative, has little bearing on an attitude toward war. We would not expect a full-fledged conscientious objector to stand by while a madman sprayed Times Square with machine gun bullets, or while an assassin took aim at the President."

Such judicial precedent is rendered nonexistent when a bureaucratic form arrogates to itself the role of grand inquisitor. The very questions asked imply that the answers sought will be both relevant and determinative. In fact, they are neither. I know that, you know it, and I daresay Curtis Tarr knows it too.

Paul M. Heberling, associate professor of sociology, will teach a course in archaeology with field work being conducted at Sheep Rock on the Raystown Dam site. This is the last year such work can be conducted since the new dam will flood the 9,000 year-old location in 1973.

Jack Troy, assistant professor of art, whose ceramics' classes are popular with community adults as well as Juniata undergraduates, will offer classes this summer. There will be a special workshop in the use of glass.

A special course in western religious literature is being offered by Dr. Jose Nieto, Assistant Professor of Religion, and an expert on the history of the Reformation whose recent book on Juan de Valdes won acclaim from Spanish scholars.

Dr. Kaylor said the course offered by Dr. Nieto will be granted credit by the Religion and English departments and should be of special interest to public school teachers who are teaching classes in religion.

herself. Twenty-five years old, she was only a few months away from a master's degree in music at Temple University when she decided to join the Socialist "movement." Abandoning her bass violin for a career in politics, she states that her displeasure at current abortion laws was the main reason she joined the Socialist Workers' Party.

She gives the impression of a very dedicated person, never diverting from a discussion of "her party." Her only financial support comes from what amount of literature she can sell in her campaign visits.

Juniata was also visited last week by candidate Bud Shuster, who is running for the Ninth Congressional District seat of Pennsylvania against incumbent Elmer Hawbaker. The district which Shuster is trying to win includes the cities and boroughs of Altoona, Tyrone, Chambersburg, Huntingdon, Shippensburg, Selinsgrove, and Lewistown.

Shuster visited Ellis Hall during the lunch hour Thursday and chatted with many students.

It now appears that the 18 year-old vote has begun to bring the candidiates to Juniata and the students of this campus may find themselves in the midst of this year's political campaign before next November comes.

THE BIG HOUSE

directed by Barb Gahan

Stanley Kubrick's Clockwork Orange will probably be one of the most controversial movies of 1972. Basically it is a futuristic story of a boy named Alex, who, along with his companions, enjoys beating old drunks, stealing cars, rape, and anything that might be considered "ultraviolent". His life of violence leads him to a conviction of murder at the age of fifteen and he is sent to jail. While serving his sentence he becomes a guinea pig for the state in an effort to reform him a la Pavlovian negative reinforcement. Alex emerges from jail incapable of doing evil but is now minus the free will to choose between good or evil. After his release, Alex endures a variety of torments and political pressures until he is finally "cured" at the end of the movie.

Kubrick's ability to communicate to the audience visually is outstanding. His images are striking and stay in one's mind long after the movie is over. The impact of violence in Clockwork Orange is greater than in any movie I have ever seen. This is not necessarily praiseworthy, but Kubrick's appropriate use of violence is essential to the movie. He has the ability to place the audience in the same position that Alex is placed to extinguish his violent drives. Another reason for the movie's success is the amazing talent of Malcolm McDowell, who portrays Alex.

Although the movie is successful over all it has its share of faults. The audience is constantly being hit over the head with sexual symbols, violent and strange sexual acts, until the importance of sex to the movie isn't clear at all. An example of this would be Alex's simultaneous seduction of two, supposedly twelve year old girls, with the film in fast motion in time to the William Tell Overture. Another criticism I have with the movie is its partial inability to communicate on a nonvisual level. While Kubrick is getting the audience wrapped up in what they are seeing he fails to do the same with what they should be thinking. If the viewer isn't aware of this, the themes become subordinate to the images.

We offer a developmental alternative in undergraduate education for those who want to affect the structure and priorities of our society.

Programs in the arts, communications, video, urban studies, social sciences, mental health, community development, education, basic human problems, political sciences, law, environmental science, etc.

Our sliding scale tuition enables students to attend who might otherwise be unable to afford a quality education.

A concurrent work/study program helps students find meaningful jobs to support themselves and complement course work and individual and group projects

We feel that college and universities must respond to the needs of the communities that surround them and not just to their own needs.

Our campus is located in three areas: Washington, Columbia and Baltimore.

We are now considering applicants for Summer and Fall, 1972.

Flying home to Chicago from Detroit on the wings of a Jefferson airplane I was greeted by a zephyr chilling enough to frost my already cold blood and freeze my lil' fanny. I was greeted by Alice Cooper dressed in frigid pink and shades of deep purple. Together we fought the mountain of traffic at O'Hare's pentangle to reach the desk of the Quicksilver Messenger Service. I fought the temptations to rip open the envelope, remembering it was the ides of march. The message inside summoned me to the Funkadelic, a small club in the Loop at the corner of Brewer and Shipley. We took the Emerson, Lake and Palmer to Waukegan and then caught a big yellow taxi to the city of my dreams. The chase was thru downtown, with news of the war and the weather report blaring from the radio. I made the move and slipped our cabbie the badfinger in a gesture of utter defiance. As the bells peeled after midnight on the lower east side, my elephant's memory betrayed the spot of our rendezvous. Flashing a grin at some kinks imbibing on canned heat, and noticing a trio of ugly chicks I muttered something about it being a three dog night. Edgar Winter's white trash trucks were already collecting the city's refuse, so feeling like the grateful dead I asked the cabbie to deposit me at the Madura so I might cop a snooze before continuing my odyssey.

"A hairy situation for an unsuspecting lass..."

Pro—Con: Dorm Escort Policy

This week we're talking about the escort policy. Do you know how confusing it can be to discuss this policy? We met guys who were escorted in girls' dorms and girls who were escorted in guys' dorms. We met girls who wanted guys to be escorted in girls' dorms and guys who wanted girls to be escorted in guys' dorms. Then there were guys who wanted guys to be escorted in girls' dorms, and girls who wanted girls to be escorted in guys' dorms.

But! There were also guys who didn't want girls to be escorted in guys' dorms, while there were guys who didn't want guys to be escorted in girls' dorms.

Are you still with us?

If you're still reading this column we're totally astonished!

Personally, we feel like trapped rats in Dr. Master's fiendish maze. In fact, before we're done we may need an escort to get out of this article.

Probably the most universal attitude was against the escort policy in the guys' dorms. "Personally, I can't see an escort policy as far as open dorms are concerned. The original purpose was to keep from having all-out orgies in the hall and I don't think Juniata College students are capable of that." expressed Mike Finkle from the bottom of his cotton pickin' heart.

Henry Siedzikowski couldn't see much reason for girls being escorted either, 'cause "girls don't generally go around raising hell in guys' dorms."

"Just let the girls walk up to the room and knock on the door." said Mike Jablonski.

Nancy Brand agreed. "They should forget it for the guys' dorms."

Keith Colonna summed it up very well. "I see no purpose in the escort policy. The advantages supposed to be gotten from it aren't gotten. Guys don't really escort girls. As long as the guys know it's open dorm there's no need for escorts."

Blindly stumbling into the second partition we rediscovered the Grand Old American Double Standard. "Although girls are mature enough to walk down this hall I think we need to continue the escort policy in girls' dorms," observed Larry Cerny.

"There's the case of unwanted visitors though with the elimination of the escort policy. If you simply don't want to see a guy, how do you know he won't just pop up at your door at any time? With the policy you can just refuse to see him up," said Gail Brounce.

Deb Smith wants the escort policy retained too. "There's definitely a need for an escort policy, only it should be more strictly enforced."

Moving further into the maze, another dead end that got us confused was people who wanted the escort policy in the guys' dorms. Tom Kurtz saw how "girls could hassle guys," and Dave Judd was afraid that "girls could get pretty well grossed-out" without an escort policy.

"I think it is a good policy but it should be enforced more because it can create a hairy situation for an unsuspecting lass," mumbled Gary Ober under his pillow.

Valorie Priddle sided with Tom Kurtz. "I can see how some guys could really get cornered by uninvited girls bugging them all the time without an escort policy."

The last stumbling block in our maze were people who wanted to see the escort policy in girls' dorms dropped.

Kevin Weir said simply "The principle of the thing is all right But really, it's a pain in the ass."

Frank Winebrenner added that "actually neither policy is needed."

Well, how about 'dat! There's the light and we're at the end of the maze. Thanks for sticking with us the whole way. Sorry we couldn't do anything, pro or con, about the system. See ya' next week.

her genius as a creative entity acknowledged, became the heroine in the first novel by Gladys Schmitt titled "The Gates of Aulis". Esther was a painter in the true sense of this maligned appellation. She was compared favorably at this time in reviews of her paintings to being in style and power of execution an "American Derain".

Then she married, had a nervous breakdown, was sent away to an institution, came back, divorced, and took up habitation in Greenwich Village at the time when a poet named Maxwell Bodenhein was Society's darling. Time slipped a notch and Esther fell on hard times. When I met her she was living in a hovel on Cornelia Street trying to hold body and soul together with selling the fantastic sketches of her personal world to an indifferent and philistine public. Maxwell was trying to sell his poems for ten cents by the Judson Church on Washington Square. Winters in New York are cold . . . bitter. . .and harsh. Esther finally, in desperation brought on an eye hemorrhage and was hospitalized.

A wealthy sister in Pittsburgh now sends her room and board money and allows her to spend her days trying a few warm rays of sunshine, all that remains of that marvelous world of color she once saw.

The last time I spoke with Esther was when I had taken back a huge batch of her work I had unsuccessfully tried to sell for her. I was leaving the city and took them with a few dollars up to her room at the St. George. She was sitting up in bed. The room smelled of rotting plaster and unwashed air. "I can see a little, Ed," she said. "but I'll never be able to paint again." Her huge eyes filled with tears. She moved her hands in a small gesture of futility and added simply, "I don't know what I'm going to do. . . ."

Now, the world you're preparing yourself for is right out there by the railroad track. Be sure you're on that train and not in the Hotel. Prepare yourself with knowledge of human behavior for the gut fight for survival of the fittest. The people out there don't give a damn about your sensitivity or potential. It's what you have that they can use. They'll buy that!

Songs about parents have changed somewhat since the days of "I want a girl, just like the girl. . ."

Health Music affects the listener, too. It's easier to work out our own problems through someone else's efforts. And sing along. We can easily play audio voyeurs and eavesdrop on other people working out their neuroses. And some of ours surely overlap. This Health Music has been called names from Freudian to Fraudulant — but it's a music that can teach us something. Between Previn and Lennon, there are five albums to show for it. Might just be the perfect gift for your parents' anniversary.

J.C. Track Team Out For First Kill

by Tony Martuzas

I have never tried to be a partisan Sports Reporter and this time it's going to be pretty rough not to sound as though I'm some kind of cheer-leader. To start with, I'm on the team and the guys really put out, especially Coach Mitchell's distance men and Coach Rabine's sprinters and hurdlers. By the way Coach Bunton, the field boys are tough too.

Back from last year's 6-3 team are defending MAC and NCAA regional pole vault champ Bob Zimmerman and the current MAC 100 yd. champ, Dave Sparks. Also back from that IO school — breaking team are Chris Perry in the 220; Joe Caradetti in the long jump and 440 intermediate hurdles; Mike Winterstein, the current school record holder in the javelin; and Dennis Weidler, who will again be in the mile and the two mile run.

Other vets are Skip Jones and Vince Yaniga in the shot; Mark Dincher, James Willauer, and Tom Wynn are back again in the discus; and Carl Koval, Grant Brewin, and Larry Hoover return to the half-mile run.

Brian Maurer performed exceptionally well during the cross-country season and he can be counted on to run along-side Dennis Weidler. Ron Tomcavage, another freshman, should perform well at his specialty— the high jump and long jump.

I've been a trackman for some time now and reporting the meets should come quite naturally. As head coach "Chick" Bunton once said to his lettermen and frosh earlier this year, "This year, our teams haven't come up with winning records. I'd like to see the track team finishing the season on the lean side." He's not the only one.

Golf Season Begins in April

The J.C. golf team will begin their season in April as defenders of the Dickinson Invitational Tournament.

There will be five letter-men returning this year out of a seven man team, so experience will side with Juniata. These golfers are Brian Clemens, Marty Dansbury, Courtney Graham, Chuck Rahauser, and Tom Van Ormer. Coach Germann expects no problem in choosing the new members for there is a "good field (of golfers) to choose the two people from."

This year the golfers will play by a new set of rules. In previous years the players were involved in "match play" where a golfer played an opponent and the winner scored the point value. Now, however, the game is "medal play" where only the top five scores count as the total team score. This will lengthen the actual time of play by one and a half to two hours because concentration will not be on out-playing the opponent but with playing the ball for a lower score.

JC Cagers Drop Last Two Games of Season

by Mike Finkle

The tribe basketballers closed out their season with two losses to Upsala, and Franklin and Marshall. Tom Griffin scored 14 and Ron Straley 13 in the Indians Friday night loss to F&M by a score of 70-64. In Saturday night's finale, Juniata had seniors Ron Straley, Tom Griffin, Harry Wertz, and Sophomore Ed Podgorski in double figures; but it wasn't enough to overcome Upsala and they lost to the tune of 91-72.

Juniata Wrestlers Place 10th at MAC's

Juniata's grapplers placed 10th in a field of 17 teams at the MAC championships at Elizabethtown over the winter break. Junior Jim McCartney placed fourth in the 126-pound bracket and finished 10-3-1 for the year. Freshman Barry Fry (167) also advanced to the consolation semi-finals but was on the short end of a 7-4 score. Defending champ Wilkes retained its crown while host Elizabethtown was second.

Lillian Gish Presents History of Silent Films

by Patrick Minnick

Lillian Gish, who was a great movie star back in the days when our parents were playing with dolls and riding tricycles, made an appearance at Oller Hall Tuesday, March 14, and presented a series of film clips from the early days of moviemaking and a narrative about the art form in the years between 1900-1928, "when the movies grew up." The story told by Miss Gish began with the most simplistic films where the camera position remained the same throughout the film and the plot was quite short and rather boring by later standards. Her tale of the primitive celluloid then progressed through the early classics such as D. W. Griffith's The Great Train Robbery, which made much better use of camera positioning and film editing than previous movies, up to the extravagant and highly complicated films made right before the introduction of sound to the medium.

Miss Gish, who made very few talking films, feels, as did D. W. Griffith that the introduction of sound may not have been the wonderful invention that most people believe it to be. Griffith once said that sound would mean an effective loss of audience to American films because while people of most languages understand gestures and "body language", only one-tenth of the world's population understands English.

After her appearance, Miss Gish met members of the audience backstage, one of whom was President Stauffer, signed autographs, and talked to interested students about possible careers in the film industry and acting in general. She recalled that her only acting lesson was all in one sentence, "Speak loud and clear, or we'll get another girl."

Lillian Gish has been working in acting and the movies since she was only five years old and according to her, she has had only about two months off from her work in that amount of time.

Her tour with the clips from old films has been running for six years, the first three of which were spent in Europe where she has been received in Edinburgh, Paris, London, and Moscow. More recently, the tour has been running in the U.S. and Canada where 95% of the performances are at colleges and universities. As a partial result of this tour, Miss Gish received a special Academy Award for "extraordinary contributions to the history of motion pictures."

Dr. Drews Initiates Preschool Project

by Valorie Priddle

"This is yellow Jeffrey. Say 'yellow'?"

"Fine, now Jeff, put yellow on yellow?"

On March 13, sixty-five Juniata students volunteered to forfeit their hard earned vocabulary for eight weeks to help pre-schoolers start building theirs. The Preschool Tutoring Project, initiated on this campus by Dr. Julie Drews, has as its main goal the teaching of language to preschool children. Large numbers of children enter school without essential language concepts like the meaning of between, behind, beside, in and under. At a highly individualized level, the Project hopes to convey not only the meanings of these five prepositions but also verbs, colors, shapes, animals and body parts.

The two other main goals are:

Your eyes are clouded with sadness, like the soft blue sky before a warm spring rain
There is no word for good-bye,
only tender kisses and hopeless tears
The things we say seem trite to us now, but what we feel is unique.
These very thoughts have wandered aimlessly through our minds before;
But now they run, leaving no time for contemplation—for time is elapsing, rushing then on No words could ever express what your firm embrace has told me;
The methodical beat of your heart against mine, tells me you are lonely, though you're still at my side.
My body trembles, as you move away, for now you must leave me to stand on my own.
There is no word for good-bye,
only tender kisses and hopeless tears—
So kiss me now, our reluctant good-bye that we may give in to our tears.

Sophomores: "Leaders of the Pack" at All Class Night

Saturday, March 18, marked the 35th anniversary of that merry madcap evening of perverse stage productions, JC All Class Night. Contemporary satire was the basic theme of this year's four class plays; in fact, in all instances this theme was an extremely basic, down to earth, or shall we say "earthy," ingredient. The evening was highlighted by the Sophomore Class presentation, "Rock and Roll is Here to Stay," which took first prize; the Seniors, Freshmen, and Juniors placed second, third and fourth, respectively.

At 8:15 p.m. the curtain opened before a slightly inebriated impatient crowd (the audience); loud guffaws and paper airplanes from the peanut gallery filled the air.

A series of skits entitled "The New Freshman Curriculum" started off the evening's performances. Staged by the Freshmen Class (naturally enough), the presentations were supposed to be satires on the new curriculum, but shortly turned into a series of cynical, cutting impersonations of several professors involved in the program. The Modes of Thought course and Writing Program were satirized during the production, but they were undermined by thoroughly slicing the people who instigated them to ribbons. In our opinion, the whole thing was done in poor taste, excluding the Romeo and Juliet ballet skit, which may very well be remembered as one of the more humorous points of the evening.

The Sophomores followed up this bitter pill with an enjoyable satire about college social life in Huntingdon, Pennsylvania ("Don't bother to look; it's not on the map.", a place where "ducktails fly" and "grease is golden.") The story of life in this rural community is narrated by two Penn State college students who happen to stop at the local soda fountain while passing through the town. Bobby-soxed saddle-shoed college students made the scene, and local greasers enter to liven things up. "Rusty, dusty, oldy, moldy" hit records of the '50's and '60's in addition to a well-constructed set helped make the play a success.

A welcome intermission followed with more loud guffaws, paper airplanes and shouts from drunken disorderlies. At this point it was difficult to determine audience from performers, and perhaps the roles might have indeed switched had the lights not blinked and the curtains not opened.

The Juniors started off the second half of the evening with a presentation entitled "Alice in Wonderland Revisited," which can be best described as a "Rabelaisian Rip-Off." Alice, a sweet young thing of 18 years, seeks a psyche break from endless studying at Juniata College. She is convinced by a local pusher to take a drug ("Try it; you'll like it."), and she finds herself in Wonderland where a golf tournament is about to take place to decide who the next President of the United States will be. Front runners include Richard Nixon, Ed Muskie and Hubie Humphrey. ("Make no mistake about that.") But Alice manages to take the tournament cup, the Queen of Hearts takes Alice's bra, and the Junior Class takes the whole audience. Tata. In the end, Alice decides to bag the drugs and stick to beer. We didn't laugh all that hard

by Henry Siedzikowski

Every college campus has a number of unusual and interesting individuals counted among its student population. Juniata College is no exception. One such student is Sammy Buo.

Sammy came to Juniata from Cameroon in Africa. He was originally interested in going to Tofts College, but they could only offer him a graduate education, so he was referred to Juniata to work for his undergraduate degree. He is studying international relations.

While here, he is taking an active interest in what is happening back in his homeland. He is an active member of The Cameroon Students Association of Arts and Sciences. This organization is trying to encourage Cameroon students in this country to take an active interest in the affairs of Cameroon, such as politics, economics, and the sciences.

This year, the association is publishing a Journal of Cameroon Affairs. The journal will include editorials and articles on the political, economic and scientific affairs of Cameroon. It will also keep the Cameroon students here informed on what is happening back home.

The January-February issue of this journal is very special to Sammy Buo. For one thing, it is the first issue to be put out. For another, it is edited by Sammy Buo.

On page one of the journal, he states its purpose. He says, "This journal is the product of the brain-searching and devoted efforts of a few Cameroon students who felt that at this stage of our educational development, there ought to be be an association for the young Cameroon university students, one which would provide them with a medium through which they could exchange ideas with each other and expouse their feelings on various academic, cultural, socio- econo-

Rock and Roll Generation

by Bob Kraut

Can classical music possibly survive the exploitation of those "ballsy" rock musicians who aim to incorporate it into their idiom? In his Downbeat column of March 2, critic Michael Levin leveled his abuse at three albums purporting to do just that. Emerson, Lake & Palmer's "Pictures at an Exhibition", "Fragile" by Yes, and the soundtrack from "A Clockwork Orange" were verbally attacked with all of the ferocity of a hungry shark zeroing in on a wounded whale. Not that these three albums need be equated with a dying behemoth, but that a jazz critic of the distinction of Mr. Levin should choose to wade into the turbulent waters of rock music and attempt to discredit its vanguard, reflects a misunderstanding on his part of the aspirations and directions of both Emerson, Lake & Palmer and Yes. Being unable to bring myself to the inhuman endurance required of standing in the lines that accompanied "A Clockwork Orange" in Philadelphia, I must waive any judgment of it's soundtrack and rely instead upon defending "Fragile" and "Pictures at an Exhibition", both of which recently graced my turntable.

Mr. Levin's criticism concerns itself with the fragmentation of Mussorgsky by ELP and Brahms by Yes, on the premise that such thefts of priceless art treasures contribute nothing to the cultural bases of this country. His fears seem to be that the best elements of classical music will now be such as has already happened to isolated and subsequently regurgitated by these cultural bandits, the music of the country-blues-jazz tradition. Make no mistake about it, rock has stolen and adapted profusely, but why this turns some people off continues to amaze. Apparently such people believe as Ravi Shankar does, that Indian music cannot be played without devoting one's life to it. While this is perhaps archaicly noble, I'm curious how many records Ravi Shankar thinks he would have sold were it not for George Harrison; ditto B.B. King were it not for Mike Bloomfield and Eric Clapton; Miles Davis if not for B, S & T and on and on and on. My guess is it's not the wealthy musicians who complain, but the impoverished critics. At any rate, I find these attempts at fusing classical music with rock certainly more ambitious than any of the aforementioned successes.

Yes and ELP are so far ahead of the rest of their field as to be conspicuous by the absence of any notable challengers. Part projects such as the Moody Blues "Days of Future Passed" and the Beatles myriad experiments with symphony orchestras, string quartets, and Phil Spector's Wagnerian-esque backgrounds now pale with amateurism. Both groups possessed none of the instrumental virtuosoes of ELP and Yes. Keith Emerson is really so good it scares me. To find a player of his background and skill emerging in a rock band is truly frightening, especially after the long succession of chord plunkers and blues runners among past keyboarders. Likewise Rick Wakeman, late of the Strawbs, who entered Yes while "Fragile" was being cut, and has brought the new life and depth that the group needed before it could spring to superstardom. Both

by Edward Kinchley Evans

At about eight fifteen in the evening at Alumni Hall on March 13, Big Bruce determined the time, gathered himself up, and ambled toward the stage. Giving the scattered audience an inscrutable appraisal, he began to prepare us mentally for the proper acceptance of what we were to bear witness to for the present evening and the following two. In essence, to save us from the embarrassment of some Yahoo in our midst who might laugh at rather than with the program.

The film being shown to inaugurate the series was "Way Down East", directed by David Wark Griffith and starring Miss Lillian Gish. It was made in the year 1920 and to throw some perspective on it time wise, I would conjecture that Big Bruce's mother was being born at about that time. So, we have had two complete generations come of age since that movie was created.

David Wark Griffith was perhaps our greatest film director. Using the medium of the film, he was constantly involved with the problem of the human condition struggling with the question of morality as practiced by both the 'clean' and the 'unclean'. He used people and situations to say visually and emotionally what needs to be, in order for us to free ourselves from the sins of pride and selfishness. In "Way Down East", a tale of innocence betrayed by the 'unclean' and persecuted by the 'clean', Griffith used the fragile beauty of Miss Gish to illuminate the fact that the pure in heart are often silly and that adversity gives one strength to speak the truth when it needs to be spoken.

On March 14 at Oller Hall at again around eight fifteen, a small waif like figure floated out onto the stage and like a child began to tell us about a by-gone era when our world was young. We were shown film clips to illustrate the progress of the use of the face and body to create a language more eloquent than the spoken word, only to have it wiped out overnight by the coming of sound.

There is a scene in "Way Down East" where the character portrayed by Miss Gish, a young girl who through a mock marriage has been betrayed by a wealthy rogue, has had her baby die, and is now being thrown out of the christian' Squire's home (where she has been employed) due to the fact that another gossipy christian' has revealed that she has been an unwed mother; the girl goes out into the wintry storm and in desperation and exhaustion collapses on the ice of the river. The ice begins to break up and with her hair and one arm dragging in the icy water, she drifts towards the falls. At a crucial point, Richard Barthelmess, who plays the Squire's farmer son and who loves her, steps lively on the breaking ice and at the last possible moment, rescues her as the ice continues to crash over the falls. No doubles, no protective last minute helicopter rescue squad, just her on that damn ice slab with Bathelmess in a heavy fur coat stumbling and running towards the little figure and just a few feet from death and the falls, he picks her up and heads back up river and to the shore. They lost four workmen and one girl died of pneumonia. Miss Gish explained their loyalty to Mr. Griffith in spite of the hazards he subjected them to as "what was up there on the screen was more important than Last to perform were the Seniors, who presented a good play entitled "Ellis' Restaurant or There's a Cockroach in my Soup." A satire on a typical student's four years at Juniata, the production cut up everything from initial admission procedures ("... and we accept just about everybody.") to living conditions in the dorm ("Wait until your 22 roommates show up; you can fix this place up real nice.") to payment of tuition and registration ("$1500 dollahs ah samestah") to food ("only one cockroach per person, please") to the final graduation ceremonies ("... and in conclusion, I would just like to conclude, for as you all know, a conclusion must naturally be a concluding of ...").

Sammy is extremely interested in his country, its affairs, its well-being, and its youth. In his editorial in the first edition of The Journal of Cameroon Affairs he states, "In dedicating the first issue of our journal to the youth of Cameroon, we are demonstrating our basic contention that our youth, whom we consider to be our most precious and most valuable natural resource, deserve more attention from the government."

Sammy is a junior at Juniata College, and from his fine work in this journal, he should be successful working in international relations after he graduates.

we were". Would that some of that old fashioned thinking and subject matter be revived now! now!

The movie at Alumni Hall Wednsday night was again Miss Gish and Mr. Barthelmess together in "Broken Blossoms" made in the year 1919. Mr. Barthelemess plays a Chinese who, in the hopes of bringing 'peace' to the British whom he considers brutish, goes to London where he ends up owning a small shop in the Limehouse district and escapes his thwarted dream with the 'pipe'.

Miss Gish is cast as a young girl who has been abandoned to the cruelty of a prize fighter who takes out his frustrations of denial of women and drink during training training periods by beating up on her. They live in the most primitive of surroundings also in the Limehouse section. After a severe thrashing which leaves Miss Gish nearer dead than alive, the 'father' goes across river for training and she stumbles out into the night and collapse in the Chinaman's shop. He has secretly been in love with this gentle creature he has watched grow up in that polluted human cesspool and uses this opportunity to nurse her back to health while dressing her as a princess and living out his dream fantasies of unviolated love. When they are discovered, the girl is beaten to death, the prize fighter is shot, and the Barthelmess character stabs himself. In an age where this is still not as uncommon as we would prefer, it came a little too close to the truth to be comfortable. What area of our lives is free from emotional drunkenness or prejudice?

At one point, deep in 'pipe' sleep standing in front of his shop, Barthelmess is approached by two men of the 'cloth'. One says, "My brother, here, is going to the Orient to convert the heathen." . . . Barthelmess smiles faintly and says, "I wish you luck."

Sitting in the audience, remembering back to when I was a small boy and couldn't read the titles of the silent screen cowboy flicks, I wondered when another fifty years has passed and the young ones sitting in front of me would be exposed to some one of their present cult, taking them back in time to when "Star Trek" and "Diamonds Are Forever" was made, what changes then will this earth have survived? And will they be as patient with their young as we have been with ours, and, as understanding?

"The nicest building on campus?"

Pro-Con: Utilization of Ellis Hall

Once upon a time the distinguished students of Juniata College were plagued with the lack of a Student Union Building. Sure, they had Totem Inn, which was actually the basement of the women's gym, a building obviously built around the time of the founding fathers. And they ate in Oneida Hall, a true delight to any gourmet. Or, if they were lucky, they could eat in Lesher Hall, where the ones in line had to watch the rest eat as they waited. But these buildings, hallowed as they may have been, couldn't equal a Student Union.

So, the students demanded what they lacked. And, the powers that be, said, "You shall have what they wish." Visions of sugar plums danced in their heads as the students envisioned a sparkling new building with a swimming pool, bowling alleys, radio station, dozens of study rooms, student offices, and T.V. rooms, a luxurious ballroom, a scrumptious food service, pool tables, ping pong tables, card tables — activities for everyone! They got . . . Ellis Hall!

Now, for two and a half years J.C. students have complained about all they didn't get in Ellis Hall. Pro and Con feels it's time to mature from that point of view. Ellis Hall is here and it's ours. So, this week we asked, "Is Ellis Hall used adequately now or could it be used more fully? What can we do with Ellis to make it more attractive to students?"

One thing we did discover. Everyone, whether they liked or didn't like Ellis had some suggestion for improvement. We hope someone is reading who can use the the suggestions.

"I think the facilities at Ellis are adequate. How many other things does a student center need?" observed DARE EULER. "The pool tables, ping pong tables are all good ideas. They should just be kept in better condition. Also, the lounge could use a few ashtrays."

CHUCK BARR said, "I like it! It's about the nicest building on campus. The bookstore could be open all day Saturday."

MARGIE HERR agreed, "I like it. It's all so new. We could add some things, but the practical, necessary items, like the cafeteria and post office, I like."

NATALIE WEST thought they could "get the T.V. fixed," but beyond that she like it. It's a good place to just relax or fool around."

"It does its job, like the bulletin boards," and VINCE YANIGA saw "no real drawbacks. No one gripes. I'd like a more open snack bar, without the booths. The atmosphere would be more relaxing. Actually, after 7:00 P.M. everyone goes back to their room and doesn't return."

DAVE HOOVER couldn't disagree more. "It seems like a big, empty shell. There just aren't as many facilities in there for such a size building."

Wasted space was a big gripe. JEFF GROVE felt "the space above the dining hall could be used for facilities, a second floor above the dining hall." And to BRAD WELLER it just seemed "that there is a lot of empty space." Brad said it could be used for "more places to study, quietly."

"I think it should be open twenty-four hours a day so that the students have a place to go at any time and utilize the facilities." suggested ANNE HOLZINGER.

SUE ROSSHIRT added that "every place closes at midnight. We need a place over there to go after twelve to talk to the opposite sex with soda and candy machines."

SHARON O'NEAL felt "the whole building is too sterile. There should be a coffee house somewhere on campus — a warm place for lots of kids to go for relaxation."

"The bookstore could carry makeup, candles, gifts, records, giftwrap, ribbon, magazines, candy, etc.," was NANCY BRAND's contribution.

CLINT ROBISON would like "louder music, more furniture downstairs in the post office lounge, a T.V. that worked, and more ashtrays. Just look at the rugs and furniture."

Well, there you have it — Ellis Hall — pro or con. And we feel there were some good suggestions among that BILL WHITEHEAD had another solution. "I think they should tear it down and build a new building with more facilities like a swimming pool, bowling alley, and T.V. rooms." Thanks, Bill, we needed that! See ya next week.

men are conservatory trained, and it shows. The only danger of possessing so many virtuoso players (run down the roster of each group, there's one at every position) is that they all tend to showoff. Emerson is more guilty of this then the rest. He's to the keyboard as Kareem Abdul-Jabbar is to the basketball court. Like Kareem, he stands head and shoulders above his rivals— he's that good.

On their fourth album we find Yes's members indulging themselves in little individual flights of fancy, most notably Wakeman's infamous "Cans and Brahms" (extracts from Brahms' 4th Symphony in E Minor Third Movement) and Steve Howe's "Mood for a Day", as delicate and well played flamenco piece as you're liable to hear this side of Sabicas. However, these are so short they seem to say "see folks, we told you we would play — now shut up and listen!" They're mere interludes between the extended pieces, which are nothing short of brilliant. Here "Roundabout" (their current hit) and "Heart of the Sunrise" (remarkably like a riff from King Crimson's "21st Century Schizoid Man") come to mind. One never gets the impression that half-written songs are thrown together, as was the Beatles "A Day in a Life", but that they're constructed with the precision and painstaking care of old English craftsmen. There are so many beautiful things going on, that it takes many listenings before one can begin to sort it all out. Powerful, moving and emotional vocals abound, and if you can't dig them perhaps you've been listening to the Osmond Brothers and not to Crosby, Stills & Nash, to whom they bear a remarkable resemblance.

ELP's approach is totally different. While Yes moves like an incredibly complex, well-oiled machine, Emerson knows when to stay out of Lake's way, and Lake out of Palmer's, etc., etc., etc. Each man brings a particular talent to the trio, and while they work well together, their music lacks the group complexity and ingenuity of Yes. They've taken Mussorgsky's piano chart, later rearranged for full orchestra by Ravel, added words, blues variations, and edited a couple of sections to produce an extended rock piece. While classical buffs will most likely be offended, rock fans will probably find it a splendid introduction to music with some substance, as quasi-pseudo-hip as that may sound. Happily, the music is once again moving toward complexity, for which Emerson, Lake & Palmer and Yes must be lauded for their attempts at bridging the gulf between long hair and long hair.

All Class Night Cup Awarded to Seniors

The much coveted Class Night Cup was carried off by the Senior Class, whose production was judged best in this annual class competion held March 25 in Oller Hall. Competition was close with each class presenting an original stunt which showed much preparation and cleverness.

The winning senior stunt was an effective presentation of scenes from the life of President Charles C. Ellis. Stunts of the other classes included a realistic mock air raid with scenes occuring in an air raid shelter, presented by the sophomore class; and an interpetation of radio-television push button tuning given by the junior class; and a play portraying scenes from the life of an American soldier given by the freshman class. In between the class stunts, short skits were presented by members of the general committee, the girls' trio, and the male quartet.

After the decision of the judges, Mrs. Max Steel, Mrs. John H. Wald, Mr. Samual Gehrett, Mr. William Swigart, Mr. Jack Oller, Tom Cooney, general chairman of the affair, presented the cup to Marion Horner, chairman of the senior stunt, and expressed appreciation to his assistants, Gretchen Smith and Lee Miles, as well as to all those who had participated in the Class Night competition.

Coach Berrier Sees Coming Season As Juniata's Best

by J. Brian Richardson

Juniata College students can look to the 1972 baseball season with anticipation. Coach Bill Berrier is optimistic that the coming season will be the best in many years for the Juniata nine.

Last year's team had a record of 5 wins and 13 losses in overall competition, but took fourth place with a 5-4 record in the MAC's. Coach Berrier feels the team has a good chance to win the MAC division this year and improve on last year's overall record.

A total of 34 perspective players reported for practice, including eight returning lettermen and a super group of freshmen. The team will be comprised mainly of underclassmen which will show dividends in the next few seasons. The team is solid at all positions, but the big plus will come from the pitching, where, for the first time in Juniata history we will have four starting pitchers.

The season and home opener will be on April 10 against Dickinson

Best wishes for a fine season.

Tennis Team Seeking Eighth Winning Season

by Sue Snyder

The Juniata tennis team, seeking its eighth straight winning season under the direction of Coach Ernest Post, opens its season with a trip down South over the spring vacation. The team, captained by Bruce Draper, a letter-winner over the last three years, is comprised of half freshmen.

Although there are five lettermen back, only Draper and Junior Pat White have won more than one letter. This, along with the loss of two year starter Al Stout due to illness, have presented Coach Post with his least experienced team in recent years. It is hoped that promising freshman Andy Vonderheyde can help pick up the team.

The season starts with exhibitions against Pfeiffer and Missenheimer colleges in North Carolina, Lynchburg and Emery Henry colleges in Virginia and Kings College of Bristol, Tennessee.

Juniata's regular season begins with St. Francis on Saturday, April 8 on the home courts. The team will play 10 matches, with eight counting toward the MAC championships. A championship tournament will be held at Moravian College in Bethlehem on May 5th and 6th.

Coach Post expects the toughest competition from MAC rival Dickinson and non-conference Indiana University of Pennsylvania, although he adds that the whole schedule looks improved over last year.

It seems that the chances for a winning season this year will rely a great deal on the ability of the freshmen to play college tennis. It will take an all-out effort to try to turn all of the 5-4 scores Juniata's way.

Andrews and Woodworth Win In Student Government Election

by Patrick Minnick

About half of Juniata's qualified electors (to qualify, you just have to be a student) voted in the election of the four top student leaders for 1972-73. The other half also exercised their traditional American freedom of choice and chose that good ol' American choice: apathy.

Those who did vote chose Dave Andrews as new Student Government president over "The Ticket" candidate Terry Bryan and Debbie Welch. Andrews does not forsee any changes in major student policies such as the dorm policy or drinking policy. However, Andrews does seem to feel that ambiguities in all student policies should be minimized so that the college, student government, and the judicial boards of men's house and women's house can tell the student exactly what courses of action are open to him and what actions are prohibited.

Dave feels that the Juniata government should become more responsive to the student body and that the student legislators should make an active effort to get out in the dorms and discover what complaints the students may have about life at Juniata. Hand in hand with this, the new student government president believes that there is definitely a communications problem at Juniata and he hopes to help alleviate it with the introduction of a student written, and student edited handbook covering all aspects of Juniata life so that the student will know what to expect from the college and what the college will expect from him or her.

Another proposed project of the newly elected president and one felt to be the most pressing, is the Task Force on Student Government. Hopefully this study will delineate explicitly the relationship between the college administrators, faculty members and students in all affairs of college government so that the student will know who to contact when a problem arises and so that improvements can be made on the present system.

As a student legislator this year, Andrews served on a committee studying the important student services of the college such as the food and health services. He thinks that there s a need for a constant re-evaluation of them and hopes that a student committee can be formed which will go to other colleges of comparable size and see how well the student services operate and then bring the results home to be analyzed in relationship to the efficiency of our own services. After this the committee will recommend action to be taken to either maintain or increase the quality of Juniata's student services.

The new vice-president in student government for 1972-73 is Phil Woodworth. Phil, who served on the Center Board this year, wants to do something in student government work, but honestly admits that he has neither the time or experience necessary for handling the president's job. Woodworth hopes that during his term in office, he can make student government more available to students with valid complaints about campus life. He believes he will be able to work well with Andrews, the new president.

Those who were less successful in their bid for the vice-presidency were Ed Smith and Ed Kohn, who

GRASS ROOTS

Compiled by Kim Hershberger

Each week, the Grass Roots staff selects, at random, the name of a Juniata Student, and asks him to contribute an article, impromptu, concerning anything he chooses. What follows is the result of this week's chance soliciting:

by Marlyn Hoover

I wish I were a poet and could write inspiring poetry or a writer who could write sensational articles. Being neither I'll do my best to share with you something that touched my heart in a way that is hard to express, Jesus Christ Superstar.

It was fabulous and I loved the music! One thing was particularly impressive— the story of love that the opera signified. Christ's life that I have heard and read for so long was emphasized through the dramatic presentation, the visual experience. It really pointed out to me what Christ did for me, a sinner who has nothing to give Him in return and who deserves nothing. (I'll probably lose some of you here who have dubbed me religious but hang on—I'm not trying to convert or "save" anyone—I just want to share!) I realized through the actor's expression of pain and sorrow that Christ suffered much for me, felt pain beyond any I can imagine, was whipped and hung on a cross with nails in his hands (and I even dread going to the dentist). He sacrificed for me, gave up loved ones and a life of renown for me. I couldn't do that for some stranger who couldn't care less about me. He died for me, a death not for someone special, his country, honor, father, or best friend, but for me! He didn't give his life because it was fun—He loved God! He didn't suffer because it tickled—He loved me! How can I be selfish anymore? Being loved like this makes me want to share it! GOD LOVES YOU!

Juniata College Awaits News of Humanities Grant

by Kim Hershberger

A new curriculm + An old system = New problems.

Naturally, it takes money to solve these problems created by our innovative curriculum. Therefore, Juniata has requested a grant for about a quarter of a million dollars from the National Endowment for the Humanities. The endowment, which is under the Health, Education, and Welfare Department, is formed to promote the humanities and the social sciences.

Juniata's administration wrote a lengthy formal proposal, explaining our needs, to the endowment. This proposal began with a short conclusive summary of the intentions of the new curriculum based on human values, both intellectual and moral, in practice, as well as in content".

The proposal asserts further "that there is a substantial difference between knowing what we want our new program to be and actually putting it into practice." Consequently, this proposal illustrates Junita's need for monetary assistance to help retrain faculty, build and redesign new courses, send faculty to study and review other colleges with innovative curriculums, etc. One specific example is that the money would be used to assist six faculty and two students in working this summer upon evaluating and redesigning Modes of Thought. If Juniata receives the grant the money will be used from 1972 until 1975 for many such projects.

Juniata was selected, from numerous proposed applicants, to be a member of a field of twenty-one colleges to be visited by an evaluation committee. Last month, Dr. Louis Norris, Program Officer for the endowment, Dr. Robert Carr, and Dr. Jack Pagdett spent two days visitng and evaluating our college. Dr. Robert Wagoner, head of Juniata's philosophy department, said that he felt the visiting committee was impressed by the fact that they sensed throughout the college a total committment to the new program.

From the field of twenty-one colleges, twelve will be selected to receive a grant. The committee of visiting professors will rank the colleges in numerical order, to recommend which institutions they feel should receive a grant. A board of dirrectors will most probably approve this ranking of the committee and officially notify the selected colleges sometime in May.

Willard Trask: Selections From The Unwritten Song

Willard Trask, distinguished literary scholar and translator of French, Spanish, Portuguese, German, and Italian, delivered a reading of primitive poetry in Shoemaker Gallery on March 22. The poems were selected by Mr. Trask from his two-volume collection entitled The Unwritten Song. "This collection," quipped Mr. Trask, "could be subtitled 'An Anthology of Illiterate Poetry' ". Tru'y, it could.

The poems, originating from the Far North, Africa, Indonesia, Melanesia, Polynesia, Asia, North America, Central America, and South America, were actually songs which should be accompanied by music and dances. It was explained that the readings were chosen as the closest to what would stand as a poem in our culture.

Newport Festival Brings Folk Sounds To Juniata College

by Bob Kraut

Can you imagine the Juniata campus being overrun by a horde of wandering minstrels? Well that's what will happen on April 26 and 27 when the musicians of the touring Newport Folk Festival light upon the college community, guitars, banjoes and fiddles in tow. The plan is to combine the finest in traditional and contemporary folk music with the festive atmosphere of the breathtaking Appalachian spring. Evening concerts on Wednesday and Thursday, and workshops, wherein diverse instrumental styles on guitar, banjo, fiddle, cello, and pennywhistle. . . PENNYWHISTLE? are in the offing. Rather than the usual rip-off concert and then "See ya all later now, he-ah!" the musicians plan to stay a spell, kick off their shoes, and pass on some of their knowledge of the folk idiom to anyone who is interested. For those seeking personalized entertainment this'll be your bag. Everything from lowdown delta blues to good ole shit-kickin' mountain music is scheduled, as to provide Juniata students with an earful of the various styles of American music performed by people who consider it all a labor of love. For most, this will be a rare glimpse at what may be a rapidly dying art form. Please don't miss it before it passes on. It'll do more to boost a flagging national pride than seeing the windows of a VW bus emblazoned with American-flag decals.

choice of life styles is basically good it its present form, but that the decision as to which dorms should have what lifestyle was made before enough information about student opinion after a year under the new system had been gathered.

Jack Stewart of "The Ticket" and Dean Shope were the candidates defeated by Umble.

Eileen Flieg was the only person concerned enough to run for top student position in Women's House. She has served as Student Government Secretary and as a hall representative. She feels there is no need for changes in the dorm policy and feels Women's House should start in a new direction, possibly bringing in speakers to talk on important female issues. One of the projects considered important by her is the abortion referral service, which she feels should be continued and improved upon.

If you took a jeweler's hammer and with a sharp crack tapped a rare stone, it would splinter into a thousand faceted pieces, each reflecting some of the brilliance of the original whole. Such was the experience of Friday evening March 24, at Alumni Hall when the room darkened and a slice of the real world was trajected over our heads and onto the silver beaded screen.

It was a Good Times production bringing us jagged fragments of the life and times of the mysterious Soul of Mike Jagger, that gangliated gargoyle of The Rolling Stones. The film was "Performance" and agitated on so many different symbolic levels that if anything more tiring than 'good guys wear white hats' exhausts you, then you walked out of one of the most interesting films to come our way this season. But isn't that a habit of yours? If anything even vaguely disturbs the serenity of your pastured landscape (mind), do you not trot yourself back out to No-Think heaven?

For the World Shakers in our midst, who forever are girding their lean loins to go forth and do battle with the status quo and reap the honors of a genine crucifixion, "Performance" slit through the painted skin of our Circus performer and let you watch him bleed to death. It was chilling.

Using fantastic photography and a sort of cinematic shorthand of split scenes without apology or explanation, we were roller-coasted through modern times when Crime and it's soul-less excrementors have slid out slimy tentacles into the Arts and has captured a Creative Being.

When the established forms of Law and Order are used and misused to aid, abet, and protect organized crime; when Money and its acquisition has when Violence is an end in itself; when Violence is excused under moral expediency; when the Creative person has to survive in a world of machines; when Noise is glorified to ear-numbing amplification; when you can't tell the boys from the girls and couldn't care less; then we have your future right before us.

One of the most frightening and beautiful scenes in this extraordinary movie is one in which Jagger, dressed in black, his gross features painted like a Babylonian

Letters to the Editor

Letters to the editor should be addressed to: Editor, The Juniatian, Box 667, Juniata College, Huntingdon, Pa. 16652. The editors reserve the right to print only non-libelous and responsible content and to edit all letters and commentaries submitted to The Juniatan. The staff also reserves the right to publish all full signatures unless the writer can supply valid reason for omitting his name.

Editor, The Juniatian:

I would like to make several comments about an article that appeared in the Juniatian, March 22, 1972, entitled "Sophomores: 'Leaders of the Pack' at All Class Night." The author of the article seems to be hiding behind the facade of your newspaper as he presents an obviously biased view that needs a certain amount of clarification. If a good journalist is going to present a personally biased view, he should at least have the integrity to sign his article. He could also very easily have written his objective news story for the front page and then put his personal feelings in an editorial.

I was under the impression that on All Class Night a certain amount of license is given and that comments and criticism are taken good naturedly. Apparently I was wrong!

The author seems very offended by the Freshman production, but his views cannot be universal. The judges (some of whom were satirized in the play) could not have been very offended, or they would not have awarded the play third place (while recent Freshman classes have done no better than fourth). The large number of Freshmen, Upperclassmen, Faculty, and Administration that I have talked to were not offended. In fact, I have not heard one bad comment, and many people thought the play deserved second place.

Our only connection to the New Freshman Program has been through professors, so professors had to be shown to represent the program. To make the play satirical (as it was supposed to be) some of these people's characters had to be slightly exaggerated, but the entire play was based on fact and was not intended to be "cutting" to any single person. Certain offensive parts were cut out by the writers, actors, and directors. By the time the censors saw the final rehearsal they saw no offensive material to cut out. If the author of the article is a Freshman (which he might just be) I don't remember him participating in any way or commenting on its offensive material before All Class Night.

I am truly sorry that our play offended the author (it seems so strange not to be able to refer to him by name) and if it offended anyone else they have my apology. I just hope that the other classes are not offended because they didn't get their share of criticism for their "offensive" material.

Yours truly.
Jim Gerek

Dear Sir,

After reading the review of All Class Night I was completely shocked by your account. After receiving nothing but congratulations from professors and students I feel a grave injustice is being leveled at the freshman class. There was no name at the end of the article so I don't know who to direct my comments to, but I am quite sure the author is not as qualified as the judges who awarded us third place.

Isn't it funny two of the people we "sliced to ribbons" were judges who awarded us Third place. Mr. Davis, in the HEH II lecture on March 21, complemented us on a job well done. It seems that the unnamed author was more offended than the professors involved. True, we did impersonate many professors, and in doing so showed their weakest points, but we really don't feel anyone suffered, and we are sure that the professors laughed along with us. The freshman who were willing to work for the play, I feel, did a very good job and as far as the cast was concerned, and apparently the judges also, the "bitter pill" was one of the finer freshman productions in the All Class Night tradition.

Gary Gillen
Freshman Director

Dear Mr. Editor,

It has come to my attention that our class play, that of the Freshman Curriculum, was nothing but a series of cynical, cutting impersonations of the professors, and the whole thing was done in poor taste. First, I'd like to comment that at the time the play was discussed, only a meager handful of students even offered their assistance, and while the script was being written, finals were on everyone's schedule. This group of students donated their time to construct a play in only a few days, and third place for our class proves how well it was done. The author who wrote the critique obviously doesn't know what Contemporary Satire is. Satire, to my knowledge and the dictionary, is irony wit used to expose abuses or follies, and our play was organized strictly along those lines. Whoever wrote the article clearly misunderstood the meaning of Satire, and I suggest he'd better do more reading than writing.

Tom Kurtz
Steering Committee

Dear Mr. Editor

As a person who actively took part in both the writing and performing of the freshmen play in All Class Night, I want to say that I am sorry if anyone was offended by our play. I guess I was disillusioned by all the good comments from both freshmen and upperclassmen, the complimentary remarks from the profs, and the third place (the first in many years for a freshmen class). Now that I think of it, the article in the Juniatian was the only bad comment that I heard, but I guess the person who wrote the article felt qualified enough to overrule the opinion of the majority and set them in the right path as far as judging plays is concerned.

Again I am sorry if anybody has been offended; please understand that it was all in jest, and to the author of the article in The Juniatian my only wish is that "one could please all the people all the time," but it seems that one has to be satisfied with just a majority.

Geoff Clarke

To the Editor:

In my opinion the review written about the Freshmen play for "All Class Night" that was in the "Juniatian's" March 23rd issue was totally unjust, unfair, and uncalled for. An article that was that opinionated should have been placed in an Editorial column, not on the front page of our paper.

We put a lot of hard work into that presentation, and I feel that its participants should be congratulated for the great job that they did for a school that is so apathetic.

This was also the first year since 1937 that Freshmen took something other than fourth place. We were proud of our presentation, and in discussing it with the professors we discovered that they also found it humorous. We did not wish to "put anyone down" in our play, and we're sorry if we offended anyone. We were under the impression that "All Class Night" was supposed to be humorous.

We admit that our presentation mostly applied to Freshmen, but we also found that a majority of upperclassmen also enjoyed our performance.

WJC RADIO

by Jim Pye

As most of the Juniata Campus knows, it has been almost impossible to receive WJC on the AM Frequency of 620 since late October. This problem arose when the FCC paid us a surprise visit just before Halloween.

Through the use of their most sophisticated equipment, they determined that our range was too great, by almost two miles, when it should radiate only on campus. Their statement: "Fix it or shut down." Well, since then we have spent God only knows how much money and manpower attempting to do so. One example: a consulting engineer (in other words an expert) at $150.00 a day for two days — you're right, that's $300.00. He told us to string brand new (and expensive) cable between North dorm, Sherwood, Tussey-Terrace and Cloister. We spent three days in below freezing temperatures and a bevy of snowstorms stringing that cable. We still radiated too much power. Now, with our budget in the red, we still have not cured the problem, but there's one more chance. We're going to have another expert. This one is the expert of experts and costs $200.00 a day. What's more, he's a hard-working guy who'll fix the problem if it's at all humanly possible. In addition, Jeff Bixby will aid Dave Hoover, Chief Engineer, are doing whatever can be done immediately to improve reception.

Note: As of March 15, 1972, it is now possible to receive WJC anywhere on campus.

WJC RADIO

by Jim Pye

My name is Jim Pye and I'm program director at WJC radio here on campus. I want to tell you about our programs for this spring since we have a full schedule of programming, and we will definitely be worth listening to. Let me start off the list with something we did just before vacation. It took one hell of a lot of beeps, but we had a lot of fun broadcasting All Class Night and some people downtown really get a kick out of it.

We're finally getting back into sports again with the coverage of all home baseball games this spring. Next year when we have some money we'll cover everything home and away. That means football too!

Our campus bulletins are already superb, giving you all the best up-to-date coverage of what's up, or down, on campus. Add to this some in-depth special features on things that really do happen around here— we're not all apathetic around here, you know. Expect to hear what some important people on this campus have to say as we start probing into what these people really think. This list already includes Dean Robinson, Walt Nadzak, and Bill Berrier.

Look for and participate in WJC's upcoming series on Individual Rights and Freedoms. It sets out to find what's really going on outside and inside the students' mind concerning drugs and intersexual relations.

Also for you political followers, WJC will bring you our own in-depth coverage of the Pennsylvania primaries from Harrisburg. This will be a warm-up for our complete coverage of the 1972 Presidential election from Washington, D.C.

So there's more to us than you really wanted to believe, isn't there, but we're never so busy that we can't use some help. If you have hankerings to be a D.J., newscaster or want really to get into political newscasting, stop in and see us—anytime.

HOW TO RUN A RADIO STATION
by Phillip C. Simmons

1. Do the chief engineer's work for him. Then fire him for not doing the work before you did. O course you don't give the C.E. any encouragement, or let him know that you respect his work — that would be too hard on your ego.

2. Choose advisers who won't make waves or disagree with you. If from time to time they might disagree or suggest alternatives, don't listen. What does anyone else know?

3. Since you are an AM/FM station, you want to improve the sound-proofing of your control rooms. To do this, double-stud the walls, use expensive pegboard (it looks like acoustical tile), use heating insulation, use four panes of glass where two will do, use unorthodox colors on the walls and ceiling, and carpet the floor. When constructing the walls, do not plan the correct number of wires between rooms: either too many or not enough will suffice. Be sure that you use up nearly all of your sizeable budget — money grows on trees.

4. Lock up all the station's records. You get only about 12 absolutely free promotional LPs and dozens of free singles every week, in addition to things like Public Service Announcements (which you don't use as much as some people would, because you want to sound professional, not like a commercial station). Lock them up to prevent the disappearance of the 3 or 4 best LPs and so the singles aren't even seen, and let the DJ's see them twice a week.

5. Draft another person to be Chief Engineer. Since it's such a thankless position, tell him insincerely that you will support him 100%. Be sure you are insincere (without letting him know it) because you don't want to commit yourself to anything.

6. Promise your C.E. that as soon as the FM control room is technically ready, you'll have enough DJ's to do non-simulcast programming at least eight hours every day. Then supply half that many, or less.

7. Tell the DJs that they don't have to watch the console meter. (Why even have a meter?)

7. Ignore the fact that your DJs don't sign the program log properly. You don't want to spend the time teaching them how to fill in a log properly, and they probably won't understand anyway. (Don't tell the DJs that!)

9. If a DJ doesn't show up as scheduled, or lets you know ahead of time that he won't be there, put on a long pre-recorded tape. It doesn't matter if it has last week's weather, times and announcements on it, or if you miss scheduled news, sports, PSAs, or contracted commercials.

10. Following receipt of a notice of violation from the Federal Communications Commission, tell hte FCC what you will do to correct the violation, then do what you please. After all, a benefit marathon is more important than Federal rules and regulations.

11. Change your position constantly. That way no one will ever know what to expect.

12. Don't plan your programming, just let it happen. There's nothing wrong with acid rock at 6:30 in the a.m. You know that people will listen to you just because you exist. That's why you don't have to provide something unique, unlike other stations, to lure listeners.

13. Don't say anything to your DJs if they're hard on equipment such as turntables and headphones. You have a C.E. to fix them. It will be convenient to forget that he has other responsibilities.

14. After it becomes apparent that rectification of your FCC violation is beyond the capabilities and technical resources of our Chief Engineer and advisers, procure the services of a broadcast consultant. Given a choice, get the one you feel like getting; not the one that is much more qualified, by all indications which may be available to you.

15. After the consultant has left without fixing the problem (which you explicitly request him to fix), fire your C.E. because the C.E. was unable to fix the problem (after many additional hours of frustration on his part) and complained about the headphones being broken too frequently.

16. Go hire the broadcast consultant that you didn't hire earlier.

These are a few glimpses of what radio broadcasting is all about, as it has been impressed upon me during my tenure at WJC. I write this in the hope that, when the right people read this, they will "wake up", and make WJC into something worthwhile.

March 26, 1972

Dear Editors,

In regards to your article in the March 22, 1972 issue on Dr. Julie Drews new pre-school tutoring project, some of those sixty-five students who have given up their "hard-earned vocabulary" might just be doing more harm than good.

For example, the constant repetition of one excercise for an extended length of time causes the younger child to become fidgety, unhappy and discouraged. When bribes are offered for preformance, as has been the case, (for example, M&M's, lollipops, and being allowed to use the piano), as well as threats of a spanking or being hit if they don't comply, the child's intellectual curiosity is anything but stimulated. The child's curiosity should be used as a teaching aid, not as a lever for preformance. In addition, keeping a child in a lounge instead of varying the environment on a perfectly nice day, does little but add to a child's anxiety.

It is our suggeston that these students should give up some of their time in order to learn at least the basics of pre-school education, if it s only to be done by a few hours of observation in the campus nursery school. We would like to make clear that not all of

The First (and probably the last) Juniatian Pop Music Poll

No one hates people who pry more than I. Why to me, those census takers are little more than Nixon-ian spys. But how the hell is anyone to know what the Juniata populace prefers unless they ask it! That being the case, I've decided to poll you, my faithful and avid readership, as to your likes and dislikes within the realm of musical entertainment.

If you happen to think Neil Young s the best male vocalist, you probably also bought Wayne Newton records at one time. But that's okay, I want to know about it. Should you find yourself being turned on, not by Carly Simon but by Ethel Merman . . . Bueno! Let me know. After all, it's no use writing about the Steve Miller Band for people who think Steve's the protege and/or son of Glenn Miller. So what if "hootenannies" are your bag? Or if you think "Hair" belongs on the barbershop floor, attendant with quartets. Write on!

Simply clip out this ballot and fill it in with the most careful consideration. I've dispensed with all those specialized categories (i.e. "Best Paraplegic Percussionist") thus allowing for a wide range of choices and interpretations. This poll is unique in that not only do I want to know your favorite artists, but your most hated ones as well. So shuck that celebrated Juniata apathy just this once. Fill out the ballot and send it to me — Bob Kraut, Box 297. If nothing else, the results should be totally ludicrous.

The songs, which could have been read by anyone, might have been more meaningful if some human interest information would have broken the monotony of what seemed like one long poem. From his presentation it appears that Mr. Trask could give no more insights than the audience could get by reading his book. A lecture on the problems and techniques of translation and compilation of such a work would have been far more significant. This is not meant as a slur on Mr. Trask's competency but rather a criticism of his confinement to the material in the book. I sincerely hope the next time we acquire the time of someone of Mr. Trask's ability, that it is employed for something more than reading.

whore, his black hair sheened to a wavy syrup, sits like a paralyzed ecstatic and from the depths of a cyclopean despair moans out a 'blues' which mocks with terrible cruelty those heart cries of our own Blind Lemon Jefferson, Ma Rainey, etc. You name 'em baby, we've crucified them, and I don't mean anything as cheap as color; I mean creative national resources of priceless value and great rarity.

All through the film, we see snags of our modern day fabric; the hidden gun, money, hash, secreted away behind the bathroom tiles; bars across the mental prison of our subterranean basement rooms; the new morality which is expressed at one point by Jagger mumbling the last words of some revered Seer. . ."nothing's Truth, everything's permitted" . . . ; the dream world we protect ourselves with against the indifference of the stop-time sequence streets our houses are on.

The movie ends with James Fox, dressed in drag, being led out of the hallucinatory refuge which Jagger has constructed and is now discovered so must be abandoned with one of the disguises mutilated with a bullet hole of truth through it's mind's eye, goes frozen faced towards a white car, back into the arms of his "agent", if you will, with new terrors of conformity to wait for. The colored doll which twitches in pain when tortured to aliveness for all the world to pay to see. A strabismic vignette of that phenomenon called Mike Jagger being led towards the golgotha of new performances. There is no escape from the World that Is, only temporary "childish" defection.

Unworthy of So Much Recognition

by Stu Treacy

As in my article in the October 6th issue of "The Juniatian," I find myself once again praising the talent and genius of Carole King on account of her new album "Carole King Music," in every way par to "Tapestry." Needless to say, I was quite anxious to listen to her latest effort. My expectations were correct; Carole King had composed another excellent album. The songs are varied both musically and in scope. A desire for brotherhood is expressed in "Brother, Brother," compassion in "Carry Your Load," a sense of movement and travel in "Back to California," of love in "Surely, Surely," and of an appreciation of music in "Music." All but one song is new, the exception being "Some Kind of Wonderful," written back in 1964 along with Gerry Goffin. As on "Tapestry," Toni Stern has also contributed in the composing of two songs, "Too Much Rain," and another which I consider the most beautiful song on the album, "It's Going to Take Some Time," dealing with an ending love affair with the same kind of quality as that of "It's Too Late." Her single, "Sweet Seasons," one of the songs on the album, is faring well on the top forty charts. The flip side of the single contains a nice song, "Pock-

THE BIG HOUSE

directed by Barb Gahan

The movie The Godfather is destined to be as popular as the novel, and there are good reasons for it. The movie leaves out all the sideline stories, which are interesting in the novel but would be cumbersome to a film, and concerns itself with the major story of the struggle of the Corleone family with the other gangster families. For those few who have not read the book the movie is self sufficient and those that have read the book have the pleasure of seeing the much admired Corleone family come alive.

The casting for the movie was perfect and so much has already been said about Marlon Brando that I really can't say anything further. However, the ability to act is certainly not monopolized by Brando. James Caan as the explosive Sonny, and Al Pacino as the cool and calculating Michael, act as though the roles has been created just for them.

The characters and their language, personalities, and environment other gangster movies seem tame and unrealistic by comparison. The one thing that The Godfather lacks, which would add meaning to a sympathetic understanding of the Corleone family's actions, is showing the benevolence of the family and how they have the ability to bring "justice" to those who have denied it within the American system.

If you see The Godfather, and I recommend that you do, it would be worthwhile to wait until it comes to a small theater. There you will not have to pay four or more dollars admission or have to contend with a huge, pushy audience, which tends to be generally ignorant and laughs and cheers at parts which are intended to be taken seriously.

et Money," not found on the album but is the title of a new motion picture. As with "Tapestry," the songs lend themselves to a certain fluidity, making the album a pleasurable listening experience.

Many artists receive merit for a successful song or album. For Carole King, her many songs of the past fifteen years and her two albums, "Tapestry" and "Music," attest to the fact that she is not only a superlative but a very successful song writer and singer. Two of her songs off "Tapestry" have been nominated for Grammy Awards "It's Too Late" and "You've Got A Friend" (as sung by James Taylor), for record of the year. "You've Got A Friend" s also being nominated for the song of the year. "Tapestry" was nominated for album of the year. All the songs on her new album are of equal quality and beauty. Her Albums have a lasting durability which will stand the test of time. "Tapestry" has been very high on the LP charts for almost a year now, and "Music" is out to a good start. In any case, "Music's" a great album. What else would you expect from Carole King?

Pro-Con: Use Of Grass Growing At JC

This week Pro and Con decided to "deal" with the campus-wide problem of "grass." It's not what you're thinking though, the grass in reference is green and grows on Juniata lawns.

As we lightly trip down memory lane, we can all envision imposing signs saying "Keep Off the Grass." As Spring blooms, so does the perennial question of whether or not to walk on the grass.

LINDA RICHARDSON can't see staying off the grass. "I walk on the grass all the time. It doesn't hurt me!"

The Pro and Con staff then ventured upon the MOST LIBERATED WOMAN ON CAMPUS. "I say if it makes you feel good and it doesn't harm anyone else, do it." This anonymous person also supported her statement with a quote from Kahil Gibran — "And forget not that the earth delights to feel your bare feet, and the winds long play with your hair."

CHUCK (TUNA) BATES offered us an analogy. "If they are going to go as far as to put up signs to not walk on the grass, they might as well as put up signs saving, 'Quit Breathing, Save Our Air!'"

But not all people were in favor of walking on the grass.

RUD JOHNSON said, "When they put up the signs, they were a joke. If the sidewalks are there, use them, but I don't think people will use them."

JIM PARSONS added, "Once in a while I can see walking across the grass because of time, but I don't think people should walk on it all the time."

Another interesting aspect in support of not walking on the grass was directed toward visitors. PATTI WEISER felt that, "the placement of the signs is what is important because they were located in the areas where the visitors to the J.C. campus gather. If the signs were all over campus against walking on the grass, then I would have yelled."

As usual, Pro and Con also covers the middle of the road positions on a subject.

"Walking on the grass is fine, but people don't need to walk on the same pathway every single time until the grass is destroved." This was the sentiment of FAITH SHOEMAKER.

MARK DINCHER agreed with her and added, "signs should be directed towards keeping off the paths."

There were also suggested solutions to the question at hand.

DEB SMITH thinks "places where there is no grass, like in front of Oller and Good Hall, they ought to fence off and plant grass properly."

Another solution was expressed by JACK (ACE) CARTON as to the paths around the academic building or Good Hall. "They should construct sidewalks at an angle in order to cover up the paths instead of destroying more grass. The sidewalks would look better than the worn paths, and help preserve more of the grass."

Not all the people had something to say. JUNE CRAMER thinks, "there are more serious problems on the J.C. campus than walking on the grass."

The ultimate solution to this question was revealed by ED RICHARDS in a very conclusive statement. "It is up to the individual to decide whether walking across the grass is right or wrong. No one should be forced to make either decision."

Special thanks to Lauren Ernst and Chuck Bates for their assistance this week.

HOW TO STAY IN COLLEGE

1. Look alert. Take notes eagerly. If you look at your watch, don't stare at it unbelivingly and shake it.

2. Bring the professor newspaper clippings dealing with his subject. Demonstrate fiery interest and give him items to mention to the class. If you can't find clippings dealing with his subject, bring any clippings at random. He thinks everything deals with his subject.

3. Nod frequently and murmur, "How true". To you, this seems exaggerated. To him, it's quite objective.

4. Laugh at his jokes. You can tell, if he looks up from his notes and smiles expectantly, that he has told a joke.

5. Ask for outside reading. You don't have to read it. Just ask.

6. Sit in front, near him. (Applies only if you intend to stay awake.)

If you're going to all the trouble of making a good impression, you might as well let him know who you are, especially in a large class.

7. Be sure the book you read during the lecture looks like a book from the course. If you do math in Psychology class and vice versa, match the books for size and color.

8. Ask any questions you think he can answer. Conversely, avoid announcing that you have found the answer to a question he couldn't answer, and in your younger brother's second grade reader at that.

9. If you must sleep, arrange to be called by a friend at the end of the hour. It creates an unfavorable impression if the rest of the class has left and you sit there alone, dozing.

As to whether or not you want to do some work, in addition to all this, well, it's controversial and up to the individual.

WJC Features Drug Series; Asks People to Speak Out

by Chuck Knouse

We wish to speak, and encounter those willing to answer, on the subject of drugs.

WJC will present a series entitled "Human Rights and Freedom". The initial topic is drugs—here at Juniata—from the student's viewpoint.

Is it merely coincidence that every play at All-Class night concentrated at least a portion of its theme and time on drugs? The answer to that is a question. . . "how many of your friends smoke pot?"

We will limit ourselves to two catagories: Marijuana, and the Hallucinogens (LSD and Mescaline). There will be three presentations.

The first will be definative—considering what is known; defeating what is rumored; and speculating on what is portable. Because there has been so much said by "official" sources about what is bad—some of which is rumor—we'll concentrate on the truth; and the more good we find, the better.

The second will be as subjective as possible. We will present peoples' reactions—those who've tried and liked, those who've tried and disliked, and those who've never tried but have formed opinions from what they've heard.

Finally, we'll discuss the legal issues involved. What is the law in Pennsylvania? What appears to be "common law" here at Juniata? What are your rights before and after getting busted? And, what has happened to others who were busted? Then, in conclusion, we'll try to come up with some answers, resulting from what we here at Juniata feel, to the following questions:

"Are drugs bad for me?" "If so, which ones?"

"Do I deserve to be punished for using drugs, even if they do hurt me?"

"Which is worse—the drug—or the punishment?"

Since our reference material will be us students — we need your thoughts. Because of the legalities involved, answer thusly: Contact us by writing box 1005. Do not use identifying stationary, do not sign, and do not put a return address on the letter. If necessary, we will reply, with discretion, through the newspaper. As soon as we receive your message, we will transcribe the contents by typewrite to our own stationary, and destroy what you sent. Tell us anything you want, anything you would like the rest of the campus to hear.

First hand descriptions of good trips, bad trips, or a trip in progress, are welcome. They will be played, with minimal editing, over the air.

I will end by giving you some of my personal feelings that prompted this study.

I have long had grave mis givings about the right of a society to determine for an individual just what is good for him and what is not. While it is undeniable that a society will determine what it thinks is good for its own preservation, why must this assumed prerogative extend into the personal domain of an individual's body and mind?

J.C. Track Team Sweeps Dickinson

by Tony Marturas

The Indian track team traveled to Dickinson College over the vacation and took eight first place finishes. Mike Slough, Chris Perry, Don White, and Dave Sparks combined to take the 440 relay. Bob Zimmerman took the pole vault with a 13'6" vault. His own record (as well as the school 's) is 14'2". Craig Nishyama and Mike Winterstein took 1-2 in the javelin while Denny Wiedler and Blair Maurer took 1-2 in the mile run.

Ron Tomcavage took first place in the long jump with a 19 foot leap (he remarked, "Well, everybody else kept fouling!"). Ron also took the high jump by clearing six feet and took a third place finish in the triple jump.

Coach Rabine and Bunton's boys will be meeting Deleware Valley today, and the team's first home meet will be this Saturday, at three o'clock.

THE JUNIATIAN

VOL. XLVIII, NO. 19 | Juniata College — Huntingdon, Pa. 16652 | April 19, 1972

Juniata's Mascot Name No Longer Appropriate

The following contains the names of a special committee formed to make recommendations to President Stauffer concerning the possible changing of the Juniata sports nickname, "Indians." The letter explains to the committee the reasons for seeking a new nickname.
Mr. Jonathan Hunter
Mr. David Andrews

Five additional students to be named jointly by Mr. Hunter and Mr. Andrews
Dean Thomas B. Robinson
Mr. Walter Nadzak

President of the J Club or another athlete to be named by Mr. Nadzak
Mr. Thomas Snyder
Mr. Foster Ulrich

Two additional alumni to be named jointly by Mr. Snyder and Mr. Ulrich

One faculty member to be appointed by Dean Norris

I should like to ask those included above to serve as a special committee for the purpose of making a recommendation to me concerning a new name for Juniata athletic teams. As you know from reports in the public press, a number of other colleges and universities, as well as professional athletic teams, have found it desirable now to select a new nickname in place of the name "Indian".

This movement is responsive to the expressed desires of leaders among the American Indians. These leaders consider it a racist act for "Indian" to be used as a nickname. It now seems appropriate, in deference to the suggestion of Indian leaders, to give up the nickname that they consider derogatory.

There are many Juniata people — and I am among them — who believe that "Indian" has not been used in a negative way. Instead, there has been a feeling of warmth and respect for the Indian heritage of the Juniata Valley. Nevertheless, this feeling can not be readily communicated to others and it seems, therefore, that a change should be made. As I stated above, we want to do this in deference to a very worthy part of our society, the entire American Indian community.

It will be appreciated if you will meet to determine your method of operation as a committee. I would suggest that you invite, particularly from the campus, letters which would make serious suggestions about a new nickname for Juniata's teams along with statements in defense of each such suggestion. Your committee will be responsible for conveying to me a recommendation which you think would be in all respects suitable and appealing.

President John N. Stauffer

Hartman Accepts Grant to Attend University in D.C.

Donald T. Hartman, assistant professor of philosophy at Juniata College, has been selected to participate in the Summer Institute for the History, Philosophy, and Sociology of Science at the Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C., from June 12 to July 21, 1972. He has received a grant from the National Science FFoundation to finance his attendance at the institute.

The 30 participants, selected from over 600 applicants, will have the opportunity to study with some of the outstanding scholars in the country, including Dr. Saloman Bochner, Princeton and Rice Universities; Dr. Stephen F. Barker, John Hopkins University; and Dr. George Polya, Stanford University. The purpose of the institute is to improve the teaching of science by college and university instructors, including those in the physical, biological, and behavioral sciences and the philosophy of science.

Hartman will attend two lectures daily on mathematics and its role in the development of the sciences. This instruction will make it possible for him to prepare two of the four courses he wil be teaching next fall.

A Magna Cum Laude graduate of Albright College in 1965, Hartman received his M.A. degree from the University of Michigan, where he is currently working on his doctoral thesis in the language of psychological theories.

He has been a member of the Juniata College faculty since 1968, and he was appointed associate dean of the college in September 1971.

A former resident of Lititz and a graduate of Warwick High School, Hartman is the son of Mr. and Mrs. Isaac S. Hartman, Lititz.

Artist Jack Troy Displays Crafts in Shoemaker Gallery

by Patrick Minnick

An old bread dough mixer to mix clay, two homemade kilns, a few potter's heels and a whole lot of special dirt inside the defunct hardware store behind North, are the basic ingredients for the Earthworks, Juniata's ceramics center. Jack Troy, the teacher-artist in charge, is pleased with the progress of the center since the college acquired the building in November of last year. Students in the pottery and ceramics class are learning the skills needed to turn out a good pot, and to glaze and fire it. The two kilns used for firing the pots were both built by Troy with the aid of students; and a considerable amount of money was saved by building instead of buying; and the function of the homemade kilns is just as good as that of the commercial models.

"What can be done with a potter's skills besides turn out flower planters and mugs? For an answer walk over to Shoemaker Gallery between now and April 28 and see Mr. Troy's works, many

Foreplay Jitters Melt As Students Get Into The "Act" On Stage

"Oh, war, war! The dream of patriots and heroes! . . . A hollow sham . . ." These words are the essense of George Bernard Shaw's comical satire on war — Arms and the Man — which was recently presented by the actors of Juniata's Totem Theatre. The play was given in Oller Hall on three consecutive nights last week.

The staging for the play was simple, but effective. A unique theatre-in-the-round setting allowed the audience a close relationship with the actors. Consquently, a greater understanding and feel for the play was achieved. The college audience seemed to respond very enthusiastically to the entire production.

The three act play, staged by Clayton Briggs, involved eight characters, all supposedly living or visiting within the home of the Pethoff's, Bulgaria's wealthiest family, Raina Petkoff, the family's maiden daughter, who tried to act sophisticated, was believably played by Susanne Hitchner. Catherine Petkoff, her flightly mother, was excellently portrayed by Lynn Huenecke. The stern, but comical master of the house, Major Petkoff was acted by Don Tobias. A paradoxical, Swiss professional soldier, called Bluntschle, was tastefully played by Ronald Mason. Sal Azzaro flamboyantly protrayed Major Sergius Sarnoff, a boisterous, arrogant suitor for Raina. Sylvia Hunter adeptly acted the part of Louka, a conniving, ambitious servant girl, who felt that she was above her present station. Brad Rudy skillfully portrayed the "soul of a servant" in the character of Nicola. A blundering Russian officer was played by Ken Skelly.

The cognac flows freely as the cast of Arms and the Man celebrate opening night.

It took good acting to produce the play, however, the power of George Bernard Shaw's words explicitly comic devices to make his comment on war. The irony of the exaggeration, the mechanical actions, and the incongruity of the characters was used as a mockery about the attitude of people during wartime.

The costumes for the play, from the Krouse Costume Company, Cleveland, Ohio, made the production very believable, (including Major Sarnoff's sword which almost wounded several members of the audience.)

Arms and the Man was the first campus production to appear under the Totem Theatre banner. Totem Theatre extends an invitation to faculty and staff to join in campus-wide theatre. While no faculty or staff appeared in last week's production, the theatre group has high hopes for the future.

Students Raise Funds for Support Drive

by Lynn Reed

Class presidents, freshmen class representatives, and their recruited classmates recently completed a massive telephon in which nearly every parent of a student at, or graduated from Juniata was contacted. The telephon's purpose was to solicit support for the Annual Support Fund, a fund-rising campaign of the Juniata Parents Association, which had a 1971-72 goal of $20,000. All of the money will be directly applied to the support fund, to provide support for student scholarships, help subsidize faculty salaries, and buy urgently needed educational equipment.

The three-week campaign was supervised and guided by David Kreider, assistant to the Director of Development at Juniata. About $14,000 of the money has been raised, which surpasses last year's goal by almost $3,500. I'm sure the Administration and the faculty owe these students and administrators a vote of thanks for the fine job they have done.

GOGGLED

by Joan Steffner

Four years old. The world is rich with color. There is so much that it makes her dizzy—so much to smell, feel, touch, do, here. . . So much! She loves it. She gets involved in everything that happens during every moment of her life . So many "little" things break her heart each day, but then her many joyous moments hold no bounds. Her fervor in living makes the world as full and warm as summer wine. She has the freedom to enjoy all under the license of her childhood innocence.

Her fourth birthday. Her mother tells her that it is time, and gives her the eyeglasses. She must have the sight of the society.

Suddenly the world becomes like a giant balloon—stretched tight with air. Bouncy, light, insignificant, and superficial. She could only see the outlines of the trees. The sky looked like a Peter Max cartoon. Her three-dimensional vision diminished to a parade of cardboard, two-dimensional objects. She couldn't really understand what she heard. She could barely listen to other people, and could only hear a whisper of the sounds of life that she had heard before. Most noticeable were the tags that hung from each person's back. These were of various sizes. When a person turned his back, other people would quickly judge him, decide upon a name, and write it on the tag. Then the tag would grow one empty line longer, preparing for the next name. These tags were never removed. The small girl didn't understand the meaning of these tags, yet when she asked her mother, neither her mother nor she could understand each other. They pretended they did.

After a few days, the girl's glasses accidentally fell off. She was playing near a lake. As they dropped to her feet, she woke to the beauty of life around her, and it intoxicated her. She had been warned by her mother to never take her glasses off, but in her excitement she lost the shadow of those shallow, outlined words and playfully tossed the glasses into the lake.

For the next fifteen years she merrily danced through life. She lived as none of her people lived, and loved life as none of her people knew. Her poor mother despaired for her, and searched undyingly

by Bob Kraut

by Bob Kraut

The first time I saw David Clayton—Thomas perform with Blood, Sweat & Tears he reminded me of a soulful lumberjack who got lost on his way thru Toronto. By the second time I saw B, S & T, I was sure he resembled a funky Porky Pig. True, David Clayton-Thomas does not look like your average under-fed, round shouldered, shaggy-haired rock star, but the man sure can sing.

The man and B,S&T have now parted ways, oddly enough in the paranoid rock world, on friendly terms. B,S&T drummer Bobby Colomby produced this solo outing, and sits in along with former mates Dick Halligan and Dave Bargeron on some of the tracks, but largely the supporting cast is composed of L.A., New York, and Memphis studio musicians. While this record occassionally gives one a feeling of deja vu, it is both better and worse than his recorded performances with B,S&T. As a jazz aficionado I miss those excellent instrumental solos, but for those not so appreciative this album is mere filet mignon compared to what was once a Chateaubriand. But then like beef, jazz is often a luxury item these days. David Clayton-Thomas then is primarily a pop album pretending to be nothing else. Ballads and blooze, funk and fun abound.

David has utilized songs by contemporary tunesmiths like Neil Young, Todd Rundgren, Edgar Winter, Gary Wright and David Clayton-Thomas, and relied upon seasoned arrangers like Klaus Ogerman. Jimmy Haskell and Jimmy Guiffre to assist in imparting his distinctive touch. "Dying to Live" is like something I'd expect from Tony Bennett, while "We're All Meat From the Same Bone" might have been a big hit for Little Richard. What David Clayton-Thomas is trying to do by courting both the rockers and the cocktail set is very often suicidal. But then he fronted the group that managed to span that gulf quite successfully. Who knows — maybe he'll become the Sinatra of the Seventies? 'Cause he sure can sing!

Prof. Davis Presents Readings From Nabokov

Vladimir Vladimirorich Nabokov, the subject of Mr. Davis' reading on April 13, is a contemporary writer who has published in three languages, Russian, French, and English. Selections were read from Nabokov's novels Lolita, The Defense, Speak, Memory, Ada, and Pale Five. "Nabokov is the most outstanding prose stylist in the English language," said Davis.

Lolita is not a "skin book", as some think, but rather an erotic exposition of different kinds of love. The game of chess was the major metaphorical device in The Defense which was translated from Russian. Ada, which Mr. Davis calls Nabokov's most complex novel, is the story of another planet which is a distorted reflection of earth. John Slade, the main character of Pale Five writes an auto-biographical poem, analyzed by his next door neighbor in the second half of the book.

The sparsely attended affair was held in Shoemaker Gallery. Despite a fair presentation, Mr. Davis presented a valuable insight into a relatively obscure author.

for her daughter's glasses. She tried to be her daughter's glasses for her, but when the girl left to study at college, the mother knew that the only hope left was to find the glasses.

The girl found even more freedom away from her mother's efforts. College became a wonderland — Peter Pan's Never-Never Land. She danced her life away.

A few weeks ago, her mother found the glasses in the lake. She had nearly drowned herself getting them. It was hard for her to clean them and present them to the daughter, and an amazing effort for one of the goggled society. The daughter put them on.

Life faded, and as the girl looked at her own enormous, scarred tag, she succumbed to her small death.

IVCF Holds Book Drive For Prison

How are you ever going to take all those books home this year, JC students? A solution to the problem is being offered by the Inter-Varsity Christian Fellowship. It is called a "used book drive."

The IVCF group is collecting used books for the state correctional institute in Smithfield. Sociology professor Timothy Brubaker told about the need. The prison's inmates lack reading material that can be used for both pleasure and eductional purposes. Therefore both fiction and texts can be used.

Books should be deposited in one of the boxes located at four places. These are the main desks in Ellis Hall and Founders Hall or the lobbies of the Academic Building and Good Hall. The drive ends May 1. Contact Dave Miller, 644-2494.

of them just created in the last few months. The clay marvels run from traditional and beautiful goblets and pitchers to modern surrealistic pieces of ornamental work that tickle the imagination. Some of the pottery is for sale, however Troy would rather barter than place a cash value on his work because he feels this adds more meaning to the object.

I'M A TUTOR! ! ?

Kids kind of just learn things, right? I mean it's all very simple and once a kid hears someone talking about a yellow lemon he knows what yellow is and what lemons are Of course! This is perfectly obvious to all biochem majors and probably even people majoring in nuclear physics. The only reason education majors take so many "education courses" is that they don't want to take fascinating things like "Quantum Mechanics." It isn't as though they learn anything.

"This is yellow, Cindy. I can touch yellow. Can you touch yellow? Very GOOD! . . . Touch yellow. . .touch yellow. . .touch yellow . . .tou. . .Cindy, say yellow."

"God girl. Now touch yellow. Say YELLOW."

"GOOD! Touch yellow. Say yellow."

"YELLOW! ! ! ! "

(Kids are also conceited little brats all too ready to indicate their low opinion of your intelligence; it was very obvious to her that, after all her trouble, I still didn't know what yellow as.

"Let's try something else. Can you touch triangle, Cindy? Very good! Say triangle."

"I want an M&M."

(So much for 'behavior modifiers'!)

"Cindy this color is yellow. Let's find all the yellow things in the room. . . . What color is this?"

"Yellow! ! ! "

"You're right! This shape is a triangle. Let's separate all the triangles in the bag." . . .the moment of truth. . . "Cindy what color is this?"

"Triangle."

Any entomologist can (and will) tell you that the most effective reasponse is beating the kid on the head. But one thing you learn in all those required ed courses is, hopefully, that if the kid makes a mistake it is your fault, and the kid should beat you on the head. "Ouch. Very good, Cindy. Now. The circles is beside the blocks. Touch the circle beside the blocks. GOOD!" Since of course you use many concrete examples to illustrate your concepts, you have to be extremely dexterous to shuffle the various items around. If you aren't fast enough she is able to answer the question before you have a chance to ask it.

So then you decide to ask someone who will give you a chance (because you can beat them on the head if you goof) and so you go to see Dr. Mitchell about changing your major. But he's out running so you go to one more tutoring session. The dream of an intelligent, calm, controlled adult patiently and lovingly sharing the wisdom of the ages with a young, unformed, eager mind . . . teaching . . . such blissful joy . . . holding up a green cross . . .

"What color is this Cindy?"

"IT'S GREEN ! ! ! !"

"GOOD! What shape is it?"

"CROSS! !"

"Hey WOW! ! You really know it now! That's good! What color is this?"

"It's yellow and it's a circle and I bet you can't run faster than me."

"You know something? I bet I can't. Let's go for a walk and look for blue things."

"O.K. Know somepin'? You're my friend."

Thanks Cindy. I really like you too. Sorry Dr. Trexler—nursery schools have sand boxes too.

by Pat Lichty

Dear Sir,

I am writing this in regard to the mimeographed paper "Basic Information Regarding Dope In General and Hullicinogens in Specific" which recently made its appearance on this campus. When I undertook the authorship and distribution of "Basic Information. . .," I had hoped that the motives which governed my actions would be obvious. However, such has not been the case among certain members of the Faculty and student body. I am therefore compelled to present the following explanation.

To ignore the fact that drug abuse does occur (even here at Juniata College) is sheer folly. Likewise, to hope that the usage of drugs is a problem that can be wished away, kicked under the rug, or eliminated overnight by arresting all those who use drugs shows both total ignorance of the subject, and a dangerous lack of concern not only for those who use drugs, but for their friends, comrades and families. Given the fact that drug usage occurs, the most logical way to minimize the danger it presents is to provide those individuals who have decided to use drugs with facts. Facts which might prevent somone from being poisoned, facts which may prevent an overdose, facts, which, in the event that overdosing occurs, may save much anguish, or at least serve as the basis for first aid until professional medical help can be obtained. If the style in which this information provided is offensive to some, so be it; my intention in writing and distributing "Basic Information" was to reach those to whom that information is of most vital concern, and not members of the Faculty and Administration.

In closing, I should like to cite the administration of Lehigh University as the source of the idea behind "Basic Information." The Whole Earth Catalog and The Psychodelic Guide to the Preparation of the Eucharist served as my main bibliographical sources concerning dosage and antidotes. The Variety of Psychedelic Experiences, LSD the Consciousness — Expanding Drug and numerous other books and articles, especially those by Aldous Huxley, have inspired me to view the use of hallucinogens with objectivity, if not hope. I am apologetic to the readers of "Basic Information. . ." only for the fact that I have subjected them to, at times, atrocious misspellings. And finally, I deeply regret the recent incidents which provided the final impetus behind the writing of "Basic Information."

Respectfully,
Name withheld upon request)

Lime

by Edward Kinchley Evans

Out of the petrified forest of the Past, a delightful old relic was exhumed, dusted off, and with wrinkled bed sheets presented as the initial offering of Totem Theatre on the evenings of April 13, 14, and 15th at Oller Hall. It was staged rather than directed by Clayton Briggs.

One would have hoped for this occasion in a Day and Time of Space travel (both inz and out of the head) one of the newer playwrights of this Century, dealing with situations which the developing mind is having some difficulty coping with (such as 'hanky-panky' and the generative gap, enceinteville and it's inhabitants, de-taloning familial birds of prey, stuff like that, ya know what I mean?).

But let me not Soap Box but rather chisel into this piece of wood. The play was George Bernard Shaw's 1894 (sic) bit of esoteric plagiarism called "Arms and the Man" (dreadfully reminiscent of an old Chekovian chestnut called "The Boor". It was all about War as we would like to think it is waged by dolts, idiots, and 'chocolate cream' soldiers who carry sweets rather than bullets (Kissenger-Kossinger?); the breakdown of the class structures (Mifflin versus Taylor?); and True Love winning out over stupidity (Taylor-Burton against Fisher or Tiny Tim and Miss Vicki lighting up National T.V.) or some such nonsense. It was witty, fast paced, and never once grabbed you by the Crystals to examine even for a moment anything that has to do with Human Emotion being felt by the heart.

Everyone was hamming it up to a frantic romp; everyone except one of the female performers. Obviously determined to stuff some degree of Truth into this sawdust, Sylvia Hunter being. . .not playing, and there is a difference. . .Louka, the maid with more than maid's ambition, she almost destroyed the evening attempting to take Shaw seriously. I loved her! People who pl : vi[illegible]ntique dolls' (i e. Shaw) better watch out. Give it to her and she'll crack it's little head open and stare you down that it's not a real baby and where the hell Is the real one?

The Chocolate Cream soldier had a head of freshly laundered hair that Absalom himself would have envied and a truly remarkable gift of being quite capable of watching the audience yet without a moment's hesitation or pause speak his lines in their appointed place giving the impression of someone watching something going on outside a window yet carrying on a relatively sane conversation with you. .and such divided attention deserves faint praise in arena threatre.

Lynne Huenecke, who plays the mother Catherine Petkoff, is the type of actress who should be given an American role where she might bring all that energy and vivaciousness to good stead without having to chew up a dialect which she and various members of the cast occassionally took a stab at.

But so much for feathery playwriting. What was exciting about the evening was that Something by the students was being presented at Oller Hall. There was at least the opportunity for those who wished to discipline themselves into lines and blocking to do so. And creating a role and memorizing. The attendance of the Faculty was truly encouraging and their support is hereby acknowledged and

The first two years, hardly anyone ever did it in Ellis Hall. Then this year it just semed like everyone started "lighting up." (Is that anything like turning on?) Well, not quite, but almost as Kool.

The Pro and Con staff decided to take advantage of the situation. We knew there had to be a story there somewhere. So we run off Pall Mall to get our good, Old, Gold pens to give you the True story on smoking in the cafeteria. It was a Lark!

Hopping upon the nearest Camel, we set out to hide among the (Benson and) Hedges to nab our first quote. The first one we grabbed was BARB HUNT. "I'm one of the last great sitters and often I like to smoke when I'm sitting in thought. I don't do it a lot, but I'm definitely for smoking in the cafeteria. It's great for diets — if you smoke, you don't eat."

"A lot of people enjoy smoking right after eating and instead of going through the trouble of going outside, one can sit at the table and enjoy a smoke. It makes the meal less formal, and as long as the smokers don't blow smoke in peoples' eyes, they won't bother anyone," said TOM CLARK.

DAVE COCKLEY was in an agreeable mood. "I guess I 'Kent' see any reason why they shouldn't. I have to admit at times it bothers me, but it's their right. So why not?"

CINDY BISHOP agreed. "I don't see any real problem. If it doesn't bother anyone else, it doesn't bother me."

Trying to Salem on a new idea, KEITH BLACK said, "I don't mind if other people smoke, but I wish if they're going to let them smoke, they should provide ashtrays."

Rising out of Marlboro country, DIANNE REKLIS came forward to give an opposing point of view. "I don't like it because people put their cigarettes out on the plates. Also, it's a firehazard, and there's no ventilation."

Deciding to fight rather than switch, like any good Tareyton smoker, MARY KRONE expressed, "It's repulsive! The fumes make me sick to my stomach and I can't eat. People just don't have the right to interfere with the rights of others. Also, teachers should uphold the same rule, which is not upheld in the classrooms."

When asked about the problem of smoking in the cafeteria, JOE SNYDER got the problem off his Chester-field in this manner. "The cafeteria, . . I don't think it should be in the cafeteria. People aren't in there that long. You'd think they could keep from smoking that long."

We ran across JIM COMBS, and what a Lucky Strike. "I'm against it because it shows a lack of consideration for others who may be bothered by smoking."

DEBI SPINNEY summed up the opposing point of view. "I smoke there occasionally, but I think it ruins a meal. I like to have a cigarette, but after I get out of the cafeteria. The people I eat with usually stay for quite a while after eating. Someone lights up a cigarette and I just think 'What the heck?' But I'm really against it. People should wait. There are a lot of non-smokers around and it does bother them."

Last of all, we decided to get the facts. Clearing the Bel Air, TOM ROBINSON said, "School policy is no smoking in Baker Dining Hall, established when the building was built. But how do you enforce it? People have come to me, both pro and con, about a policy change. The student activities committee is working on the problem now."

Well folks, whether you like smoking in the cafeteria or not, always remember, you lose some and you Winston.

Thirty-Two Years Ago

from the Juniatian of Oct. 8, 1941:

A Handful of Knowledge for Ye Freshmen at College

I can vaguely remember that every time I went home as a Freshman, someone would ask me what I had learned at school. It's a little embarrassing at times, so, just to help you Freshmen out a little, I have drawn up a comprehensive account of some knowledge you should already have gained, and have divided it, into two parts: Grammar and Word Study.

Grammar

1. When you feel it imperative to dash, always keep in mind that the First Person is an upperclassman.

2. Never use too much of the comma in writing your themes, and always enclose your theme in quotation marks.

3. Be active, by all means, but when an upperclassman becomes accusative, it is wise to turn passive before he becomes demonstrative.

4. It is unwise to decline the invitation to appear before the Freshman Tribunal when your case comes up, or to try to modify your sentence afterwards.

5. Freshmen are to agree with upperclassmen in every particular, and restrictive clauses are to be considered absolute constructions.

Word Study

1. Diagonal: a straight, oblique line dividing the student body into equal parts, Freshmen and upperclassmen.

2. Green: a color indicating immaturity, as in green apples, and also the working of life and sunshine, as in green grass.

3. Name: an ornamental neckpiece commonly worn by Freshmen to aid the delinquent memory of the upperclassmen.

4. Theme: short essay on a given subject, with a given grade and a given effect upon the Freshman who is doing the taking.

5. Knee: the articulation of the leg and thigh bones, used by the Freshman girls as high water mark for their socks.

JC Comes Into Home With Two Wins; Opponents "Strike Out"

by Pat Monahan

On April 10th Juniata played Dickinson to open the baseball season. The final score was 5-1 in favor of the Indians. In the bottom of the third inning, Juniata took the lead 2-0 with Karl Bergstresser's double which brought in the runs. Ed McNeal's single brought in another run in the bottom of the sixth. Again in the eight, Bergstresser's double brought in two more runs to give Juniata its final score. Dickinson's only score was Jeff Thompson's home run in the ninth inning.

Mark Amatucci pitched for Juniata and gave up 5 hits, 1 run, and walked a man twice. Amatucci struck out 10 of Dickinson's players.

The Indians had a total of 9 hits out of 31 times at bat and nine walks.

On April 12th Juniata traveled to Susquehanna for their second win. The game ended 6-4. Juniata took a 3-0 lead in the second inning by the efforts of Ed. McNeal, and Karl Bergstresser. Susquehanna scored two of their runs in the fifth inning. Juniata came back in the top of the eight, to score their other three runs. These runs were scored by Tom Streightiff, Craig Palardy, and Ed McNeal. Susquehanna added their two other runs in the ninth inning.

Lou Eckerl was the starting pitcher for the Indians. He pitched 4⅓ innings. He gave up 2 walks, 5 hits, and 2 runs. Eckerl had two strike outs.

Jim Slovic relieved Eckerl in the bottom of the fifth inning and gave up 1 walk, 5 hits, and 2 runs. Slovic had a total of six strike outs including the strike out that ended the game with two men left on base.

Juniata had 7 hits out of 36 times at bat and 2 walks.

April 15th's baseball games against West Virginia and St. Francis were rained out and will be rescheduled at a later date.

If you feel that your College life is a bore and that nothing is happening, examine the use of your time. How involved are you with the activities that are available? If you interest yourself in something a little beyond the narrow confines of your own selfish ennui, you will be surprised at how much you will hate the added responsibilities and absolutely enjoy every minute of it.

Going to College is much like swimming. If you lay on the water, nothing much happens, you sink or float, but splash around a bit and you find yourself being propelled along at a breezy clip and discovering new abilities which will bring admiring glances from whichever sex interests you. But that's another play.

Post Script: George Bernard Shaw is a 'safe' playwright whose teeth have long since been pulled and there is little danger of our being gummed to death. But stand alert for the next Totem Theatre production. It is "Mother Courage and Her Children" by Bertolt Brecht, a playwright who does not bite for pleasure but out of hunger for the Human Soul and his plays draw blood.

Student Selected To Preach In Local Parish

On June 1, James Hutchinson '73, a junior from Duncansville, Pa., will become Associate Minister for Christ Parish, Rockhill. Hutchinson is a licensed minister in Middle Pennsylvania District, Church of the Brethern and a member of the Carson Valley Church. He has been active in the Deputation Team and is pre-enrolled at Bethany Theological Seminary. He replaces Jonathan Hunter '72 who has served as Associate Minister during the present academic year.

In a policy decision by the congregations, it was agreed that one of its greatest missions could be to take young student ministers as assocates to the pastor and provide this opportunity for experience and training. Christ Parish is composed of two Church of the Brethern churches, Rockhill and Blacklog, and two Baptist churches, Saltillo and Three Springs. The primary functon of the Associate Minister is preaching twice each Sunday morning.

The Faculty Executive Committee sees the Newport Folk Festival and the American Arts Festival as an exciting educational experience and urges therefore that all faculty make this opportunity available to all students in whatever way possible. For example, they encourage the cancelling or rescheduling of as many classes as possible. For those classes not cancelled or rescheduled, they urge excused absences or clear statements ahead of time to the students of the consequences of their missing class.

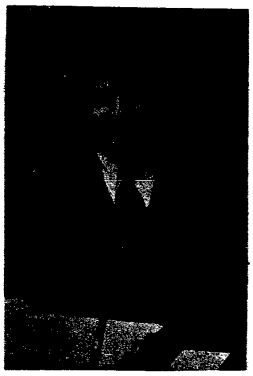
Tom Snyder Announces Retirement As Director of Alumni Affairs

by Henry Siedzikowski

At the end of the present school year, Juniata College will lose one of its favorite people. Tom Snyder, presently Director of Alumni Affairs here at Juniata, will retire. Although very happy at Juniata, he felt that due to the death of his father in February, it was necessary for him to leave and take over the family business. He will assume top management and responsibilities for Tommy Dale Potato Chips, Inc.



Tom Snyder, one of Juniata's most popular administrators will be leaving the college community at the end of the current academic year.

Tom started to work here immediately after his graduation in 1966, as a history major. While here, he was active in sports, being named captain of the Juniata football team in his senior year. He also worked on the maintenance crew during his four years here.

Even while he was a student here, he was recognized for his leadership ability. But more than that, he was outstanding in his ability to work with people, and the great enjoyment he got out of it. So when he graduated, he was immediately hired as an admissions counselor. He was highly successful in this post not only because of his fine rapport with the present generation of students, but also, because of his ability to work with people of all ages. These aitributes were to propel him throughout his years here at Juniata.

From this position, he soon moved up to assume the position of Associate Director of Admissions at Juniata College. He assumed this position in 1970. Then, in August of 1971, he assumed his present position as Director of Alumni Affairs.

Tom took this position because he believes that is is very important to keep the lines of communication open between the campus and the alumni. He has made this one of his primary tasks. He insists that the college and its alumni should have more than a financial relationship, and he has been working to create this improved relationship. He has stated, that in his view, the strength of Juniata lies in the success of its graduates in their chosen profession, the opinion that alumni express about their college and the number of young prospective students that alumni encourage to attend Juniata.

As director, he is greatly occupied with alumni clubs throughout the country. He also works with new alumni clubs that are in the process of forming. Besides these responsibilities, he is also responsible for the Annual Support Fund. This is a very important fund for Juniata, which this year has a goal of $125,000. To add to these duties, he has also been in charge of coordinating activities for Homecoming, Parent's Day and Alumni Weekend.

Tom is married to the former Mary E. LaBrecque. He was married while attending Juniata between his junior and senior years. His wife is well known as the athletic department secretary. Both of them are among Juniata's most enthusiastic and loyal sports fans.

But, he also has a great concern for Juniata's educational program, which he is convinced is of the highest quality. While he was still a student, he wrote in the spring issue of the Alumni Bulletin, shortly before his graduation that "Juniata continues to be one of the better liberal arts colleges in the nation. Among the many reasons for this fact is that her students continue to be concerned with their education."

Tom is still popular on campus. It is estimated that of all the students presently at Juniata, he gave about sixty per cent their first interview. So, we all say a sad goodbye, and wish him the absolute best of luck in the future.

Inmates Surveyed As to Interests In Higher Education

Under the supervision of Robert J. Lakatos, corrections education coordinator for Juniata College and the Huntingdon Correctional Institution, a survey was conducted in February and March among both inmates and correctional employees at Huntingdon Correctional Institution to assess college interest and needs. Information was sought concerning both the immediate direction of such a program as well as longer range planning.

Out of 150 inmates who met the minimum eligibility requirement of a high school diploma or equivalency, about 100 expressed interest in taking college courses. Also 44 out of more than 275 correctional employees expressed similar interests.

Although ¼ of the interested inmate group, and ½ of the interested employee group has had prior college course experience, both inmate and employee groups contain a large percentage of individuals who are "out of condition" with respect to college requirements: critical reading, report writing, test-taking, etc.

In a survey of interest in various courses, inmates expressed a preference for courses in economic and business administration, psychology, mathematics and sociology. For employees, the course areas receiving the most attention were sociology, psychology, English, and economics and business administration.

After reviewing the survey data, it was decided that two sections of Introductory Psychology would be offered at the outset. The courses will be taught by Lakatos, and will run for 15 weeks from mid-April to the end of July. Both inmates and correctional employees will be enrolled in each section.

It is hoped that two different courses can be offered from September 1972 to January 1973; and, as the program enters its second year in January 1973, three courses could be offered. The feasibility of having both inmates and correctional personnel come to the Juniata College campus is also being carefully considerd.

Spring Carnival Looks Forward To Successful Year

by Fredi Zwirner

On May 5th and 6th Juniata College will hold its annual Spring Carnival. The Spring Carnival is a minature fair which has grown from only 3 booths in 1968 to over 20 booths now. These booths include information, food, games and are sponsored by groups of students and town organization. Some of these organizations include the Jaycee's, Little League, Phi Delta Theta, League of Women Voters, and the Jr. Class.

The Carnival will begin at 6 P.M. on the 5th and at 1 P.M. on the 6th and will run both nights until everyone has gone home. The location of the Carnival is on 18th Street in front of Ellis Hall and Scott Street behind Lesher Dormitory and the Memorial Gym.

Approximately 100 persons participate in setting up for the Carnival and we are expecting an even larger attendance than last year which was estimated near 2,000 people.

Nittany Rides from Center Hall, Pa. will be on hand Friday afternoon setting up rides for the durapate in this year's Carnival.

Drug Survey by J.C. Students Has Surprising Results

A recent survey of drug use among high school students in south central Pennsylvania indicates that relatively few students are using drugs other than alcohol and tobacco, and that drug education programs designed to curb drug use are of questionable effectiveness.

The survey was conducted by sociologist Dr. Duane Stroman and students from Juniata College. The Pennsylvania Governor's Justice Commission sponsored the research.

Information was gathered from high school students, teachers, and administrators in seventeen public schools representing fifty-one public high schools in an eight county area in south central Pennsylvania. The seventeen schools were randomly selected after the fifty-one had been grouped according to size. Questionnaire responses from 1539 students were weighted to reflect the differential use rate of drugs by school size. Interview and questionnaire samples from sophomores, juniors, and seniors were randomly chosen within each school. Finally county probation officers and police officers in the communities in which these schools were located were also interviewed.

The survey indicated that drug use among high school students in the area is limited and mostly of an experimental nature. The exceptions were tobacco and alcohol, both of which are used regularly by a substantial number of students. Of the new social drugs, only marijuana is used regularly and then by only 7.5% of all students. The percentage of all students currently using one or more drugs other than alcohol or tobacco is apparently 10%, but nearly 20% have at least tried some drug. However, drug use at the high school level in the area as a whole is somewhat lower than in other areas surveyed, including the statewide cross-section survey conducted by Dr. Larmer.

A composite profile of the typical high school student who uses drugs is difficult, but the survey did indicate some common characteristics among drug users. Compared to non-users, there was a small tendency for current users in this survey to be males, older, to think they study less and find grades less important than their friends, come disproportionately from middle and upper class suburban homes, have more spending money, come from a large school, and either live near to or attend school close to a college or university.

The activities of current drug users differed from non-users in that the users were slightly more likely to date, "hang out" with friends on weekend evenings, and be out of the house more on weekday evenings.

While most users report getting along with their parents and report being happy, over one-half of the users feel that their parents are not very interested in them, as compared to only one-fifth of the non-users.

Users tended to rely more on their friends than their parents for meaningful relationships and were eight times more likely than non-users to report that two or more of their closest friends use drugs. Nine out of ten users reported being approached to buy or use drugs as compared to only one quarter of the non-users, and

by Edward Kinchley Evans

How important a part does sex play in your life? Does it constantly nibble at your attention or have you mastered the gift of allotting it 'it's' proper place in your awakened state?

What has caused this to alert itself as a topic of interest has been the recent attention given it in our immediate vicinity. There was a Library display devoted to 'pornography' with different views expressed by learned investigators in that field and by the obvious manifestations spawned in our society of such publications as Screw, Kiss, etc. All devoted to a view of sex that tends towards the misuse of the attention by just concentrating on it as a pleasure/pain source devoid of any redeeming quality of that old feathered term Love. Sort of a self gratification without much thought of the participating object or objects as the case might warrant. Rather blatant and crude but with it's appeal to those sturdier warriors of the flesh.

Now, a couple of movies that have been placed at our disposal continue the theme, and, for our convenience, they have been double billed at the Clifton, that last outpost of nineteenth Century Gronk.

The first of these is "Klute," a modern day tale of 'how a nice, clean working whore' (played by Jane Fonda) realizes that sometimes when you expose yourself to prurient purveyors of the tenderloin, you occassionally find them not too facile at handling meat and one can get butchered in the process. Again, a mis-use of an energy which should ignite our little vehicle down the Happiness road.

"Klute" jock straps us along at a brisk little whip past assorted perversions of this particular mode of occupation and we get to see several seamy side streets with their inhabitants writhing in various degrees of painful self-awareness. That's until our Jane sees the Wrongo! of her ways and all that potential danger and decides to try the Purist argument by settling down with One Beloved an gee! gosh durn! discarding all those gorgeous clothes for a little $2.98 cotten shift from McCrory's . . . .and she probably is gonna use her sex for babies and things now . . .or some such Pablummy ending.

Billed for a short space of time with this 'Inferno' was another look at our subject and titled "Summer of '42". It was a nostalgic fox trot back into the innocence and embarrassment of the youth of your parents. Some sensitive Soul's tentative approach to the beauty of the awakening of love with It's use of sex as the gentle kiss remembered from the land of "Let's Pretend" (an old radio serial of Fairy Tales where the only reality was static now and then). To show you just how messed up all our thinking was and is about the Basics, there is a scene in this movie where the young boy about to embark on his first physical conquest has to purchase a pack of "preventives" and God knows with what trepidations do those of that generation still have to prove their Manhood scene even in today's rather jaded and obscene world!

The movie ends with one of the most beautiful scenes ever captured on film and perfectly illustrates the use of sex above the realm of human morality and into the sphere of Beingness where two become One in heartbreak and rescue from the shores of crashing Reality.

Letters to the editor should be addressed to: Editor, The Juniatian, Box 667, Juniata College, Huntingdon, Pa. 16652. The editors reserve the right to print only non-libelous and responsible content and to edit all letters and commentaries submitted to The Juniatan. The staff also reserves the right to publish all full signatures unless the writer can supply valid reason for omitting his name.

This letter is presented as an open letter in response to that of President Stauffer printed on page one, Vol. XLVIII, No. 19, concerning changing the nickname of the Juniata Sports teams. I find the action recommended by President Stauffer to be trite in nature, totally vogue in intent, and perhaps egotistic at heart. The Juniata tradition and heritage, that President Stauffer mentions so briefly, IS something to be proud of and defended, not thrown to the wind at the whim or suggestion of someone unrelated to our community. The Valley in which we live was the home of a free and proud people: whom incidentally the whites exterminated. To deny this heritage to "keep in tune with the times" is a much more flagrant injustice than any offense that might arise from the use of Indian in referring to our sports teams. I have, being a native son of this valley, Indian blood in my veins and, small as that amount of blood may be, bear a pride in carrying it. Thus, I find the suggestion of Presdent Stauffer personally offensive.

However, should the named committee feel inclined to agree with President Stauffer, I wish to make a few suggestions. First, the frontispiece of Beeghly Library should be removed and buried in the dust of history. Secondly, the name of Juniata should be changed, for if one is not proud enough to bear the name of a people, one certainly has NO right to bear the name of their Valley. The college, in this case, would do well to be named " 'Little Boxes' Factory", and the teams something rather inoffensive, such as "The Antiseptics".

Thus I find President Stauffer's recommendation to be as senseless as the closing of the college two years ago, or the rmoval of the Margin of Difference sign because the difference could not be realized. But, of course, Juniata must be exactly like every other institution of our nature, so why not build "Little Boxes".

The most recent Pro and Con column neglected the most important consideration concerning smoking in the cafeteria. The fire hazard, the offensiveness of the smoke to other people, and the disgusting habits of the smokers who put their ashes and cigarette in their dishes are still not as important as the possible health hazard present.

The cafeteria was not designed for cigarette smoking; thereis not adequate ventilation. When a person lights up, someone narrby is going to be forced to breathe the smoke. And, it has been found, the smoke that drifts off a cigarette, or the sidestream, is much more more dangerous to people than the smoke that is insaled, or the mainstream. A smoke-filled room can kill a person with respiratory ailments, and sometimes has. Smoke can contain carcinogens, or cancer-causing substances, as well as other harmful substances. I have seen many times the effects of air pollutants on human systems.

One example of a potential hazard present in cigarette smoke is Cadmium, which is very poisonous in large dosages — and the sidestream smoke contains a significantly higher level of it than the mainstream. So while the smoke in the cafeteria as a whole is not in high concentrations, people can still be potentially harmed over a period of time by being forced to breathe the smoke stream from another person's cigarette — or pipe —or cigar — or whatever.

Incidently, I wish to express my opinion on the Pro and Con column. The column is, and always has been, superficial and inconclusive. The opinions of the students expressed in the column are nothing more that that: unbased opinion. At that, the opinions expressed usually appear to be hastily developed, simply so that the column can be written. Little authoritative information pertinent to the subject has been included; most often, the feature is more of a humor column. Of course, I realize that this is not totally the authors' fault, since they require student participation, which is difficult to find in any significant amounts. But, unfortunately, the column does not present the total scope of possible considerations as much as it should. I hope that the column can upgrade itself in the future to a point where it can be useful as a real social function on campus.

PRESCHOOL PROGRAM

Dear Editors,

This is directed to the four students who wrote the letter in regard to the pre-school tutoring program. It is obvious they have very little knowledge of this project which they have gone to such lengths to criticize. First they make the point that constant repetition of a single excercise will discourage the child. This is true, but then again only through moderate repetition can a three year old retain what he has learned. The object of this program is to teach a wide variety of concepts (colors, shapes, animals, verbs, prepositions, and body parts). The tutor is not to sit down for three hours with his child and drill him on a single color or animal. During a teaching session the child can be drilled on any number of different concepts, and the exercises are widely interspersed with periods of play. (The maximum suggested length for a teaching excercise is five minutes.)

The letter also refers to bribes for good behavior and threats for bad which stunt a child's curiosity. First of all, the cardinal rule for handling the children is: never say anything negative (not to mention threats or physical force) while teaching. We do reward children in various ways for good conduct, and if some people consider it bribing, that can't be denied. But this must been seen in the context of the entire program. Children are not born knowing what is good and what is bad. Therefore, when the teaching first begins, the child is rewarded with something he likes (candy for example), so that he will identfy learning as a pleasing experience. Then the physical reward is supposed to be phased out and replaced by verbal reinforcement. Finally, by the end of the program hopefully the child should desire to learn for the sake of learning. Whether this works or the solicitations nearly always came from friends. Thus the use of drugs is strongly influenced by the attitudes and activities of a student's peer group.

The majority of police and probation officers contacted felt that drug use among high school students was increasing, but they rarely apprehended illegal users of this age group in light of the total amount of drug use by the students.

While many schools have set up drug education programs to control the use of drugs by students, the survey found some indications that such programs were ineffective for several reasons. First, the drug education programs sampled in the public schools tended to increase knowledge, but rather insignificantly. Moreover, increased knowledge apparently does not operate to reduce drug use, but perhaps to stimulate it. Second, it was found that a student's participation in a drug education program at the high school level did not alter his attitude toward drugs. Yet a high correlation between drug use and drug attitudes was found for this age group.

These findings indicate that drug programs come too late in the educational process for many students and that they are too pharmacologically-oriented.

The survey concluded with nine specific recommendations for a drug education program, which included: 1) drug education before high school and continuing in high school; 2) drug education which focuses on the legal, social, economic, and attitudinal factors of drug use as well as the pharmacological aspects of drugs; 3) drug education programs, taught by knowledgeable teachers as part of the total school curriculum.

New York, and Mr. Doig at the Chicago State University, Chicago, Ill.

Two of Miss Coen's most recent performances have been in Rochester. She sang the soprano solos of "Elijah" with the Oratorio Society of Rochester, and played the title role in "La Tosca" by Puccini in the production by the Rochester "Opera Under the Stars."

Mr. Doig has been the winner of the Society of American Musicians contest, which resulted in a Chicago recital, and of the Oratorio division of the National Federation of Music Clubs. This last award carried with it a $1,500.00 prize, and severay solo recitals, including one at the White House.

The program next Friday night will be a varied one. Operetta and oratorio arias will be followed by some Broadway show tunes, gospel songs, and contemporary music.

The recital is being given for the benefit of the Huntingdon Music Club's scholarship fund. Tickets costing two dollars for adults and one dollar for students will be sold at the door. The public is invited to attend.

Pro-Con: IM Sports Add Variety To Life

After a year of playing football, powderpuff football, basketball, soccer, volleyball, and softball, the Juniata Campus looks back upon its experiences in intramural sports. Although at times spastic, disorganized, hotheaded, victorious, and disillusioned, the participants of intramural sports have added to the variety of extra-curricular activities.

Although intramural sports is not a major issue or problem, it does affect the lives of most people on campus. For example, the construction of this Pro and Con column was delayed three hours in order that a member of the staff could play intramural volleyball. Dodging soccer balls and loose basketballs, the Pro and Con staff ventured to the arenas of battle (Memorial Gymnasium, Langdon Field, practice football fields) and brings you a report from the male and female pseudo-jocks of this campus.

We first ran into JIM DACEY dribbling to the gym. "I enjoy them very much and they are a good idea. I feel that the intramural sports program is worthwhile and plays an important role in school activities."

"Intramural sports are neat. They provided a good chance for kids to keep physically fit even if they can't participate in varsity sports." This is the attitude of SUE (SHORTY) ROSSHIRT as she scooted by.

JEFF SCHULTZ agreed with Shorty's comment. "It is fairly well organized and it gives guys who don't wish to play on a team but wish to play organized ball, a chance to play."

Another advocate of the present intramural organization is SAM STEVER who was short but sweet. He said, "I think they're pretty good."

"They're fun! I'd rather watch than participate, and they are a good break from studying," said JUDE ROTTENBURG with a laugh.

Most everyone was in favor of the intramural program but a few had suggestions for improvement.

GREG DIMOFF, "sporting" a sharp looking cast said, "They're good but they're not organized well enough. The intramural sports program should be made available to more people because there are only a few that play in all the intramural sports."

JEFF SCOTT added, "Over the whole year the intramural sports program was good but near the end it appeared to become sort of disorganized.

Another member of the girl's basketball team, MARY ANN REPMAN, expressed some ideas for future improvement. "I think that there should be more organized sports, especially for the women. And scheduling needs to be improved because the volleyball games are jammed together."

DEBBIE WELCH cited a personal experience. "The intramural program is very worthwhile and more kids should be encouraged to participate, especially the girls. One of the most fun activities I have participated here at J.C. was I.M. football. We had a great time!"

"Personally, I think that I.M. sports are a really good idea but not enough kids know about them. They need to be publicized much more," suggested ELLEN VALENTINE.

GEORGE (RUSTY) BULLOCK has an optimistic outlook for the future of intramural sports at Juniata. "I hope that Jim Daniels can fill the spot for Dave Sparks and expand the intramural program. Jim Daniels could also check the possibilities of some type of ski club."

Juniata Celebrates 75th Birthday Today

Up until 1894, the college had several different names. After its founding, it successively became the Brethren's Normal School and Collegiate Institute, the Brethren Normal College and the Normal College. Finally in 1894 the Iroquois Indian word, Juniata, was chosen.

Many years ago a wooden fence surrounded the campus area. According to Prof. J. Clyde Stayer, who has been interested in Juniata since 1908, "It was custom in those days to enclose land with fences."

Prof. Stayer reports that for many years students were not permitted to go below 17th Street without permission.

In the founding of Juniata, the number three seems to have played an important part. There were three founders, three students who reported for the first class and three members of the first graduating class.

And Fr. Gaius M. Brumbaugh, son of the school's originator, Dr. A. B. Brumbaugh, has been a member of two of these trios. Misses Maggie Miller, Rebecca Cornelius and he reported to Prof. J. M. Zuck on April 17, 1976 to form the first class. At the first commencment on July 10, 1879, he was graduated along with Phebe Norris and Linnie Bosserman.

His father and his father's two cousins, H. B. Brumbaugh and J. B. Brumbaugh, were responsible for the founding of the College. Even today, Dr. Gaius Brumbaugh has a link with Juniata, for his granddaughter, Peggy Brumbaugh, is a freshman here.

Juniata Annihilates Delaware Valley After Losing Two

by Sue Snyder

After losing to Gettysburg (6½-2½) and then being downed by Elizabethtown (415), the tennis team bounced back by annihilating Delaware Valley 9-0.

During the team's shut-out performance Bruce Draper bested his opponent, Greg Roberts, 6-2, 6-0. Pat White proceeded to beat Ricky Ricci by set scores of 6-0, 6-1. Andy Vonderheyde and Scott Nagao defeated their opponents (Rod Turpin and Steve Jones) by scores of 6-0, 6-0, 3-6, 7-6, 6-3 respectively. Denny Buckwalter and Mike Grissinger swept the remaining single matches by scores of 6-1, 3-6, 6-3, 6-2, 6-1.

Pat White and Andy Vonderheyde teamed up to defeat Greg Roberts and Steve Jones in the opening round of doubles. Bruce Draper and Scott Nagao followed up by downing Ricky Ricci and J.C. Bailey by scores of 3-6, 6-1, and 6-1. Dana Ono and John Bowser topped off the afternoon by beating Rod Turpin and Bill McClain 5-7, 6-1, 6-2.

fore the hometown crowd, taking four running events and two field events. Denny Wiedler, cross-country standout, trimmed five seconds off the previous school record of 9:40 in the two mile. Denny was clocked with a sizzling 9:34.8.

In the other events, Dave Sparks took another 100-yd. dash with a 10.1 clocking. Mike Slough and Chris Perry took 1-2 in the 220 yd. dash with a winning time of 22.8. Grant Brevin beat out teammate Carl Koveal in the 880. Grant was clocked at 1:58.1, just three-tenths of a second off Carl's recent school record of 1:58.4. Chris Perry, in the inside lane, broke the tape with a time of 51.7 in the 440 yd. dash.

Ron Tomcavage was unable to take the pole vault (he cleared 12'6" to take the pole vault at the Bucknell meet) but he cleared 6'2" for a first place finish in the high jump. Joe Coradetti took the long jump with a 22'6" leap. The final scoring of last Friday's meet was Juniata 82, Shippensburg 52, and Lock Haven 47.

Against Bucknell on April 18, Joe Coradetti took three first place finishes (long jump, 440 I.H., and triple jump). Ron Tomcavage set a new school record for the high jump — 6' ¾", and Carl Koval establishes a new record in the 880, nipping Bucknell's Steve Nagelsberg at the finish. Both runners were clocked at 1:58.4. Next meet for the track team is Thursday, at home with St. Francis.

JC Trims Bucknell; Takes One From Lock Haven

The week of the seventeenth, left Juniata's Baseball record at 4-1. The Indians traveled to Lewisburg on Tuesday to defeat the Bucknell Bisons 10-7. On Thursday, Juniata split a double-header with Lock Haven. The first game went to Lock Haven 6-3 and the second game belonged to Juniata 6-2. Saturday's game against Lycoming was cancelled because of rain and will be rescheduled at a later date.

Bucknell was Mark Amatucci's second mound win of the season. He recorded 11 strikeouts, gave up three walks and nine hits.

Bucknell had led the game in the second and third innings and tied the Indians in the sixth inning 7-7. It was in the seventh inning that Juniata scored the three runs that finalized the score.

Juniata's runs in the second inning were scored when Ed McNeal singled, a walk went to Mike McNeal and Karl Bergstresser singled. The second run came with a throwing error and the next scored run was with Dee Adcock's sacrifice fly. Bergstresser and Jim Black brought in runs with singles in the third inning. It was in the fourth inning when Juniata took the lead with Craig Palardy's single and Bucknell's errors. Adcock and Lou Eckerl singled in the seventh for the final tally. The game was filled with errors for both teams. Juniata had a total of six errors and Bucknell had seven errors.

Thursday's defeat went to Jim Arnidis in his first mound outing of the season. He was relieved in the fourth inning by Marberger with the score 5-3, Juniata trailing.

Freshman Jim Slovic won the second game allowing two runs, five hits, seven strikeouts, and two walks. Mike McNeal had a double in the second inning and was brought home by Karl Bergstresser's double. He then came in on Rich Briener's single. Juniata's security runs were scored in the third and fifth innings.

Both teams had four errors in the opener but played errorless ball in the second game.

Diehm Memorial Lectureship Announced in Political Sci.

Dr. John N. Stauffer, president of Juniata College, today announced the establishment of a lectureship in political science which will be named in honor of the late G. Graybill Diehm, former state senator and county commissioner from Lancaster, Pa.

Mr. Diehm was the chairman for the Republican party in Lancaster County for 28 years. In addition he served the county for 32 years as a member of the Board of County Commissioners, a position which he continued to hold while serving ten years as a state representative and eight years as a state senator. While serving in the state senate he played a decisive role in policy making at the state and national level.

He is known as a man of strong principles, a man who could shape the operation of state and local government to conform to his tenets of economy and minimal government control.

The Diehm Lectureship was established at Juniata by a committee of his friends, which was chaired by his cousin, Victor C. Diehm of Hazleton, formerly president of the Mutual Broadcasting System and currently president of the Pennsylvania State Chamber of Commerce.

The creative impulse for the creation of the lectureship was provided by Graybill Diehm's brother, Judge Edgar H. Diehm, a resident of Youngstown, Ohio, and an alumnus of Juniata, who has played a significant role in the growth and development of the college.

Judge Diehm, himself a benefactor of the college, was awarded a distinguished service citation by the Juniata Alumni Association in 1970, and he is currently serving as chairman of the Juniata Founders Club, which promotes the college's continued educational advancement.

The G. Graybill Diehm Lectureship in Political Science will permit Juniata College to invite an outstanding scholar or politicain to lecture at the college on an annual or biennial basis for the benefit of Juniata's students and faculty and of the Huntingdon community.

Guests at a luncheon at which the lectureship was announced included Mr. Kenelm L. Shirk, a Lancaster County attorney, and Mrs. Shirk, Mr. and Mrs. Victor C. Diehm, Judge Edgar G. Diehm, and President-emeritus Calvert N. Ellis.

Preschool

not depends on both the child and the tutor.

Another criticism was that the children are confined to a single environment; the lounge in particular. If the only place which these students come in contact with the preschool children or tutors is in the lounge, then these students must be spending too much of their time there. Many tutors vary their tutoring locations between the child's home, their own rooms, and other points on campus. Even the tutors who work at the day care center move from room to room or take their children outside when possible.

The suggestion made in the letter that the tutors in the program should learn the basics of preschool education shows only how uniformed these four students are. Before we met our children there were three instruction sessions for all tutors. Two of these sessions were held by a woman who is in charge of a similar federally funded program for underprivileged and retarded children in North Carolina. She spoke and showed slides on methods for teaching these kids. Aside from that there have been meetings for everyone involved in the program and also meetings of small groups under the direction of a leader for the purpose of discussing problems. Also there is a resource and materials room in Good Hall which is open daily and staffed by psychology majors who are involved in the program. Tutors can go there to get help with any particular problems which they might have.

Of course, with sixty-five college students and sixty-five preschool children in a program such as this, some tutors will be more successful than others. Obviously everyone will have problems at times, and some tutors will not handle things very well. Anyone has the right to criticize, but I think that it is only fair to the people who have worked for this program to make criticisms on the basis of an overall knowledge of the program's goals and methods, rather than making a few casual observations and implying from these that the entire program is harmful, as these four students have apparently done.

Sincerely,
Leslie Whittaker

Newport Folk Festival Brings New Dimensions to J.C.

by Bob Kraut

What is folk music? According to Michael Cooney, relating the wisdom of an old Southern blues man — "Well. I ain't ever heard no horse sing!" — it's "people" music. But only those who attended the concerts and/or the workshop put on by the musicians of the portable Newport Folk Festival will be able to comprehend the truth in that simple statement. Minus the tacky show biz theatrics, folk music was revealed as the process of passing along traditional songs from one person to another. Surely the people of Newport will never make it in Las Vegas, but in Huntingdon they seemed very much at home.

It is impossible not to admire Ms. Elizabeth Cotton, a gracious 79 year old lady who plays her guitar upside down and backwards, and sings in a voice slightly akin to somebody standing on her throat. Or how about John Johnson and Larry Jackson, digging back into the roots of country blues and sounding for the world like a pair of scratchy old 78's? And you've got to respect the encyclopedic memory of a Michael Cooney or Bill Vanavesm, who know more songs and styles than you could shake a stick at. It was a very humbling experience to be in the presence of such dedicated musicologists. And how often do the performers allow you to enter their private little worlds, then actually sit down and show you how it's done? Such were the functions of the instrumental workshops.

Especially impressive to these eyes and ears was Michael Cooney, who appears to be the heir apparent to Pete Seeger. And a veritable anthology of folk songs and styles he is too. Not only was he a highly amusing and interesting performer, but a gracious and acco-

by Patrick Minnick

Move-up Day, the time in Spring when the newly elected Student Government president and senators take office, came this year on April 26. Classes were rescheduled to allow anyone who felt like it to go to Oller Hall at ten o'clock Wednesday morning and hear what the outgoing president, Jon Hunter, and the incoming president, Dave Andrews had to say about the college.

Hunter, in giving the first speech, said that it was his choice to depart from tradition and not give the usual review of the successes and failures of the past administration. Instead, he proposed to look at the institution on a broader scale over a longer period of time. Hunter first pointed back to his first year at Juniata (1968) and reminded the audience of the massive changes that have come about since then. The student can no longer say "Someone else must solve my problems." According to Hunter, the student is responsible for his education and his life more today than ever before in the history of the college. He also asked students who in the future seek changes to try to understand the position of the trustees instead of flatly making demands.

Andrews' speech was concerned mainly with the programs he hopes to work on with the help of the student body. These include a careful analysis of the food and health services, the printing of an all stu-handbook, the installation of intre-campus phones, and a revision of Student Government to better serve the college.

Dr. Klug Recipient of American U. Award

by Henry Siedzikowski

Dr. Harry Klug, from Juniata College's political science department, was given an award by the American University for long and distinguished service. The award was given in conjunction with the quarter century anniversary of the Washington Semester Program at American University.

Several persons were given these special awards at a banquet at the Mayflower Hotel in Washington, D.C. on Saturday night, April 22. This award was made more noteworthy by some of the other recipients. Among these were Senator, and now Democratic Presidential candidate, Hubert H. Humphrey, Senator Lee Metcalfe, former Speaker of the House of Representatives, John McCormack, and former Supreme Court Justice, Tom Clark.

Dr. Klug says that he can not be sure of the exact reasons, but he has a couple of speculations as to why he was given the award. First, he is one of the few people ever to do research on the Washington Semester Program. Also, he is one of the few faculty members to raise scholarship money to aid students in taking advantage of this program.

The Washington Semester is a program which brings top political science students from around the nation to Washington to study government first-hand. It consists of a seminar, where they hear Congressmen, Senators, Presidential staff members, and sometimes Supreme Court Justices. The students also write a research paper on the basis of interviews with top government officials, and take special courses at American University.

Each week, the Grass Roots staff selects, at random, the name of a Juniata Student, and asks him to contribute an article, impromptu, concerning anything he chooses. What follows is the result of this week's chance soliciting:

by Nancy Burke

It's 11:00. Do you know where your PARENTS are? Are you kidding? They never tell me where they are going or what they are doing, as a matter of fact. They never tell me anything. They are responsible for me and they should have the decency to tell me what is going on. Our parents are responsible for our education. That is over $3000 a year. It would be nice to know if we are going to get this money or if it is being squandered on trivial matters such as food and drink. Our whole future depends on them. Pity the student who has sadistic parents and is never told what is happening. That poor student may wind up as a lifer in our glorious armed services. Parents should have some concern for their offspring's future.

Parents are also responsible for our cars. When they borrow your car it would be nice to know when it is going to be returned. Suppose you wanted to go somewhere or needed to go somewhere. Forget it. Your father borrowed your car. The excuses they give are really something: "Well, I paid for it" or "I put the gas in it." Is that a reason? If they want us to work in the summer, it is obvious that they should provide us with a car. It is very simple logic.

Just look what we do for them. First, we supply an income tax deduction. We also provide pictures to fill their wallets. We are live-in no-pay servants. We are fun to be with. When we go out, they know where we are and tell us when we are to return. The only thing they don't know is what we are doing.

Physics Reps. Travel to D.C.

During the week of April 23rd, the Physics Department of Juniata College sponsored its annual field trip to the spring meeting of the American Physical Society. The convention, held at the Sheraton Park and Shoreham Hotels in Washington, D.C., was attended by three professors and five Physics majors. (Drs. Irene Engle, Ray Pfrogner, and Robert Hall, and students John Bowser, Barry Hirst, Ken Nichols, Owen Thomsen, and Myron Zimmerman.) Lasting from Monday through Thursday, the meeting consisted primarily of the presentations of 1126 highly specialized papers and 110 general interest symposiums, with subject matter ranging from the historical to the contemporary aspects of Physics and including both technical and social issues. Speakers included such well-known authors and scientists as Gerhard Herzberg, 1971 Nobel Prize winner in Chemistry; George Uhlenbeck, proposer of electron spin; Emilio Segre, who worked with Fermi and discovered the antiparticle; and Hans Bethe, the 1967 Nobel Prize winner.

ATTENTION
JUNIATIAN READERS

The Letter to the Editor in last weeks Juniatian (Vol. XLVIII, No. 20) concerning the change of Juniata's nickname was written by Tom Snyder, a member of the graduating class of 1972, not the Director of Alumni Affairs. We apologize to both Tom Snyder's that a distinction was not made. Thank you.

Center Bd. Members Attend Entertainment Convention in Ohio

by Patrick Minnick

Four members of Juniata's Center Board attended the National Entertainment Convention at Steubenville (Ohio) College from Friday, April 21 to Sunday, April 23. Pam McCloskey, Fredi Zwirner, Ed Kohn, and Del Newquist were those from Juniata who traveled west to the convention. The gathering, which hosted about forty schools, was held to give college representatives ideas on what type of entertainment they might bring to their schools.

The first night, after registration and a banquet, those attending the convention listened to a showcase, lasting from 8:00 to 12:00, which consisted of eight groups playing samples of their music as they would play for a dance if hired by a college. On Saturday, exhibitions by record, movie, and video-tape companies were presented during the day and another showcase was presented in the evening.

Juniata, in comparison with other colleges of a similar size, has a fairly good entertainment schedule, but the members of Center Board are hoping to upgrade it with the possible addition of an expanded coffee house program, a new film series, and other types of entertainment depending on the budget and student interest.

Editorial

When it is pertinent. "Juniatian" staff members take pen in hand and editorialize on issues they feel to be of prime intrrest and consideration. Each Editorial reflects the personal opinion of its author.

On Wednesday April 26th Juniata College underwent a rather queer metamorphosis (queer because there wasn't any). The day was simply (as opposed to intellectually) dubbed Move-Up Day, implying a certain alteration in the face or structure of the college. Amazingly enough, all but about 90 people (by Jon Hunter's imagination) failed to take note of the institution's abrupt divergence. Even the lucky 90 were left blinking in search of the aurora on Juniata's horizon. x

Jon Hunter opened the ceremonies by claiming to shun the traditional departing president's speech, which includes a recount of successes and failures of the past year; he then proceeded to recount the failures of the past year (I can't seem to remember any successes), Hunter did add a new twist, however; he began with his excuses and then applied them to the inefficacies. The undersized audience received the blame for the uninvolved students of this college who don't participate in the government. Was Hunter's reasoning that if the students of this college don't care, then the student government doesn't have to do anything?

The priveleged handful were then wooed by the sad story of our trustees who, with dentured mouth agape, shake their heads disgustedly at the phenomenal changes taking place on this campus. Yes, because of the mercy of our SG this year there was not much that could be done.

After passing the buck to every possible molecule outside the SG, Hunter introduced his successor Dave Andrews (a member of this year's SG, for your information). This gross transfiguration in our SG could be likened to moving from one row house to the next.

Andrews, after shunning the traditional newly elected president's speech of promises for the coming year, swiftly expounded upon his promises for the future year. Inter-campus phones, improvement of student services, and better SG — student communication were modestly proclaimed as fruits for next fall. During the course of his talk, he managed to

The Juniation

We the Independent Committee on Name Changes would like to propose the following name for consideration in the "change-a-name" game currently in progress here at Juniata. We feel that the name that we have come up with is far superior and superfluous to the present name of Indians. We also believe that it surpasses the name proposed by Mr. Snyder, (class of 1972) "Little Boxes". The "Little Boxes" idea would fit a new campus with up to date buildings which all look alike. But here at Juniata the traditions go back farther than that, than modern construction. Our heritage lies in the glorious last quarter of the nineteenth century. This was a great age. In 1876 we saw the banning of the book Tom Sawyer by the Denver Public Library. Also in that year impeachment proceedings were begun against William Belknap, Secretary of War, for malfeasance in office, and the N.Y. Society for Ethical Culture was founded. 1876 was a good year for journalism because at Harvard the Lampoon was started. Also at Harvard the catchers mask now used in baseball was invented. President Grant spoke to Congress apologising for his failure as president. And of course we mustn't forget June 25. A day we guess this whole thing about the Indians got started. On that momentous day General George A. Custer and 265 men of the 7th Cavalry were slaughtered at the Little Big Horn.

And so returning to this great heritage, we today propose that Juniata adopt the name WASP as the official name of its teams. At the present time we can think of only two advantages but we think that as more and more people consider our proposal other reasons will become clear. First we think that a WASP monogram would be much easier to design and portray than a "little box". Second it is our belief that this WASP epitomises the traditions and institutions embodied in Juniata.

And so we conclude with what we hope will bloom into a long series of new cheers:

BUZZ BUZZZ BUZZZ
WE ARE THE WASPS
BUZZ BUZZZ BUZZZ
WE ARE BOSS

Sincerely yours,
The Independent committee on Name Changes.

Way of Love

Plans. Plans were still up in the air one half hour before we all left. But finally, we said our goodbyes, and we were on our way. A memorable ride — but we got to our connection. How good it was to see her! Through much rush, she left us to eat a feast alone. I felt very calm and at ease in this house. The night came fast, and so did fatigue. A nice nap for me. At last she came home, also tired, but always full of life. A very active night, filled with the usual giggles. Morning brought the rain. Yes, it continued all day. The house was filled with such excitement; many were even nervous. But not her. She took it all in stride, calming everyone down. Soon the house was really buzzing. More people came. Then she came down the stairs. She dazzled the eyes of all. With her beautiful smile and her warm eyes, she silently let each of us feel the love in her heart. After the sighs died down, we left for the big event. Arrving early, we got the best seats. Soon the lights went down and the band started. The stage began to dance with the girls up there. Smiles, smiles everywhere. Oh, how gracious they tried to be. Then the lights went down again and she came out to light it up. Alone, in the spotlight. Our hearts were thumping. Her music started and the breathing stopped. She began to sing. "The Way of Love" filled the small auditorium with the splendor of Carnegie Hall. As if her beauty weren't enough. A few tingles shook my body. She ended and began her second song, "Until It's Time For You to Go," dedicated to the lucky man beside me. Again, the audience was hypnotized. Not to mention the constant shivers I had. She hit every note with all the tenderness and passion she could possibly let out. Although she was a different person up there, with her jeweled gown, microphoone in hand and crown on her head, we knew that she was still the same to us. Not a queen, not an angel, but a woman. The applause showed the crowd's overwelming approval. The rest of the program continued. But none could compare to her. At last the time came for her final walk. Her year was over. She began her farewell speech. Again, the audience was captured. She spoke with confidence, yet with a gentleness all her own. She was accepted for what she was, as a person, not a queen. The tears swelled my eyes when she sang. Sometimes, not often enough, we reflect upon the good things and those thoughts always center around those we love. And I think about those people who mean so much to me and for so many years have made me so very happy. And I count the many times I have forgotten to say "Thank you" and tell them just how much I love them. — A standing ovation. The pride and love inside of me was screaming. She will always be a queen to me.

The Mahavishnu Orchestra with John McLaughlin: The Inner Mounting Flame Columbia KC 31067

John McLaughlin is over thirty, his hair is shorter than George Wallace's and he doesn't sing a lick. That would seem evidence enough to hold him back in a profession peopled with unkempt, long-haired singer-composers. Oddly enough, he's the newest instrumental genius to emerge since the glorious days of Jimi Hendrix. Along with a handful of other guitarists like Larry Corpell, Sonny Sharrock, and the late Jimi, John McLaughlin was one of the first to explore the uncharted potential of instrument and amplifier. Now, John is on the way to winning the hearts and minds of critics and fans alike.

The Mahavishnu Orchestra, taken from McLaughlin's adopted Indian name, is a quintet of musicians with only the highest credentials. Drummer Billy Cobham, late of Dreams, is a virtual octopus at the skins. Those who have seen him claim he plays so fast that his well-muscled arms are nearly impossible to see. Violinist Jerry Goodman, of the much lamented Flock, is the son of classical violinists. Pianist Jan Hammer was recommended to Mahavishnu by his fellow Czech, Miroslav Vitous of Weather Report. And bassist Rick Laird, a fellow Irishman, is an alumnus of Brian Auger's band. The unusual instrumentation and the diverse ethnic influences all add up to produce a blend of international music that transcends labels and boundaries.

The Inner Mounting Flame, McLaughlin's third release as leader (he's appeared on albums with Jack Bruce, Miles Davis, and Tony Williams), has all the elements of the best improvisational music. His band responds as if by intuitive magic to each other's moves, thereby creating an excitement unequalled by any other band in recent years. The electronic instruments: violin, piano, bass and guitar sound at times interchangeable. Goodman's violin may sound like a whining guitar, or a cosmic organ. Hammer's Fender-Rhodes succumbs to all the tricks of electronic gadgetry as well, and can emulate a set of wind chimes or McLaughlin's echo if need be.

This is a stunning recording. Unlike most records it should send you off in search of new horizons for musical criteria. Be forewarned that it is not soul music, but rather music for the soul. Should you not find "Meetings of the Spirit" provocative, or "A Lotus On Irish Streams" placidly romantic, then perhaps electronic music is not for you. But those who have ears will hear.

Lime

by Edward Kinchley Evans

When I was a child and the world was young, I was snatched from the serenity of tree-lined streets, second-hand bicycles, and part-time work in the Sears, Roebuck warehouse (where on a hot summer day one could easily spend the whole day's income by drinking thirty-five to forty ice cold cokes), and I was thrown bodily into what was then rather proudly referred to as the Second World War.

I was given a gun with a bayonet and was drilled in the fine art of 'close' combat. . . ."cause we were going to fight the dirty little japs and well, boy. . .when you get close enough to them sneaky little bastards, it's going to be you or them." I frustrated a corps of instructors by my lack of enthusiasm at this particular form of 'mort ballet'. . . . by my complete if naive honesty that "if one came that close to me . .and was human. . .and was intent to kill me. . . .I would not resist and would no doubt be killed. Sorry."

I do not like to fight and I do not like to kill. I will fight though, but with killing. . . .I'm even squeamish about wringing a chicken's neck, poking a hole through a rat's belly, or snap-popping a fat flea between one's fingernails. I talk to them intelligently and tell them that they do not belong in my area and if they wish to continue to prosper to get hence. (You might scoff but it tends to work)

Besides, grownups had this disagreeable habit of shoving this damn flag into my hand and telling me to wave it or something and that I was 'fighting' for my country. I don't like anyone to shove anything at me and tell me I've got to do this or that with it, without first telling me why. There is an insistence inside my head that must know the Why before it allows the rest of me to act. This applies to religion (explain to the child in my head exactly so it can understand what God is and why I should believe in Him and act accordingly), it applies to sexual activity (why is this hunger manifested at age twelve and not allowed to be nourished until years later), and it applies to Service as defined by the Law in regards to the use of my body and time by the Government.

If you want my body and time to be of service to the Unit, then you must explain to the child inside in clear, simple language that the flag the hand is waving is a symbol representing a 'tree-lined serenity' which is being endangered and must be protected. That explanation then must be expressed visibly by everyone shouldering the gun (like when the log cabin or tepee was being attacked and everyone alerted their energies to to the mutual defense). If not, then don't expect too much from me in the way of mental cooperation cause ya ain't gonna git it. I might die in the process but for me that is just an exchange of uniforms.

What made me unwrap this bit of tacky memorabilia was a 1938

"Explo '72" To Be Held In Texas Next Month

Mark Twain once remarked about the weather, "Everybody talks about it but nobody does anything about it."

And that's just about the way things seem in the world right now. There are some problems—not much doubt about that—but the variety of "solutions" is as wide as it is ineffective. From astrology, mysticism and escapism, to protest and political activism, everyone seems to be at least trying to "do something about it," but the results at present really aren't encouraging.

Most of our tries are spiritual in nature—some process or other to ease the emptiness inside. Well, a guy in California has an interesting idea. Bill Bright, the President of Campus Crusade for Christ, International, says, "The hope for our nation and the world rests in a great spiritual awakening," and he goes on to point out, "People have tried everything else. .now, by elimination, they're coming back to God."

Now God, some people think, died a few years back. But Bright and 100,000 other Christians from six continents are going to gather in the Cotton Bowl this year to show that He's very much alive and very much ready to help.

The gathering will be called EXPLO '72 and will be the largest Christian celebration in the history of the U.S. It will be held in Dallas, Texas, June 12 - 17, 1972. The purpose of Explo '72 is to provide training in how to live the abundant Christian life, and how to share it with others.

Followers of Christ from throughout the U.S. and the world are preparing to attend Explo. One minister in Oklahoma is working on the idea of starting a train of box cars in Kansas City, swinging it through Wichita, Tulsa, and Oklahoma City in order to take high school kids to Explo.

The governor of Texas signed an official proclamation naming June 12 - 17 as "Explo '72 Week." The Director of Explo, Paul Eshleman, has addressed a joint session of the Kentucky legislature. Governor Reagan of California has asked that high school students wishing to go to Explo '72 be excused from their classes, since in California the schools are in session during Explo.

The Penn State Explo student chairman, Ellis Goldstein, stated, "We're expecting 200 students from Penn State and 400 students from other Western Pennsylvania campuses to attend Explo '72, as well as 500 laymen and high school students from this area."

On May 4, an Explo film presentation will be given at 7:00 in the Faculty Lounge (Ellis Hall). Four Christians from the main campus of Penn State will show the film and answer questions. They are part of the interdenominational Student Christian movement which is sponsoring Explo '72. Everyone in the community is invited to attend this presentation.

point out additional inadequacies of this year's SG. In the tradition of his predecessor, he concluded by placing the responsibility for SG action on every student on this campus. So don't blame the do-nothing SG or Dave Andrews.

It was a very rewarding experience for those who needed a 30 minute snooze or were in the mood for a few laughs. For my participation in the governing of this school I would like to suggest that Move-Up Day be moved up (get it?) to April First. I can't think of anything more appropriate.

Pass/Fail Grading . . .

Pro-Con: An Easy Way Out?

With the ending of another academic year many a grade precariously balances on the Pass-Fail border. Although the freshmen are not involved with Pass/Fail, Pro and Con decided to cover this topic for the upperclassmen.

Pass-Fail undoubtedly has its ups and downs. Sometimes Pass-Fail acts as a lifesaver for a student who makes an honest effort and still doesn't perform well. But there are also times when a student will do better than anticipated, and then the Pass-Fail grading acts as a detriment.

The majority of students at J.C. are in favor of Pass-Fail and MARTIN MEISS gave us two reasons in support of the system. "I think that there are two reasons why Pass-Fail grading is good. One reason is because you can take a course for no other reason than interest without being penalized for poor performance. Another reason is that it makes required courses more tolerable."

DONNA BAILEY agreed as to use Pass-Fail for "my required courses or in courses which I'm not particularly interested in. It also allows me to spend more time on the courses I enjoy. I really like Pass-Fail and wouldn't want to lose it."

"I think that they have been valuable for me because it has helped me get through my required courses without hurting my cumulative average," added KATHY KINDRON.

RICK FORNADEL gave us an idealistic view supporting Pass-Fail. "I think it is a worthy experience because it gives the students a chance to take a variety of courses and not to have to suffer academically."

Although most people are in favor of Pass-Fail there are some who have qualms about its use.

"As a device which allows students to explore new areas in which they feel that they have little ability, but would like to explore, I feel that it has great value. Unfortunately, it is being used largely as a means to avoid low grades in difficult courses," was the sentiment of SCOTT LONG.

CHRIS PETERSON agreed with the philosophy which was used to justify it in the beginning, but "I feel that it has been abused by many who have picked up a course without working for it at all."

PHYLLIS LAMONT was definitely against Pass-Fail in any form. "I don't think that it's such a good idea because it causes students to slack off. The students don't work as hard in a course."

HOWIE GROVE sums up the issue quite nicely. "Pass-Fail has its Pros and Cons. It ultimately depends on the individual and how he uses Pass-Fail."

film Classic that you had the opportunity to familiarize yourself with at Alumni Hall on the evening of April 29th. It was titled "Grand Illusion" and was all about a truly great war, called for the future benefit of historians and people who keep records, the First World War.

The film was made by Jean Renoir with an International cast speaking French, German, and English and chronicled the fate of a half-dozen soldiers who have been captured and made prisoners of war. Less about actual combat, the film concerns in microcosm the human condition of our perpetual search and need for freedom.

Rosenthal, a Jew (perhaps symbolic of Christ), feeds the rest of the group with food sent from his wealthy family (God?), and he, in the final escape with Jean Gabin (a Universal symbol of Man, if ever there was one), says. . ."you are all French fighting to protect 'your' France which you do not even own an inch of, whereas the Rosenthal family in thirty-five years has purchased several chateaux, vineyards, etc., and in truth, 'that' is a tangible worth fighting for!"

This film which is conceived of in terms of a poetic documentary explores the breakdown of old standards of conduct and the arising of newer ones not necessarily preferable.

If, in your fortress of Moral Illusion, through the haze of drifting smoke, you have not lost the ability to think, then try to catch this one the next time Life throws you the ball, so at least then you can evaluate for yourself it what has been termed a Classic has anything of Value for you to tuck away in your Nap Sack.

Post Script: We are all basically simple people with two great needs . . .to be Loved. . .and to be Useful. Find something in your life worth fighting for and secure your position with understanding.

E-town Drops Juniata In Slugfast

Tuesday's (April 25) game against Elizabethtown was the first Conference baseball loss for Juniata. With Friday's victory over Albright, their record in the Middle Atlantic Conference is 4-1. The Indians overall record is 5-2.

Tuesday's defeat was a 13-12 decision. It was n the eighth inning that the Indians came from an eighth-run deficit to tie, but lost it in the home frame of the ninth.

Lou Eckerl was the losing pitcher. Mark Amatucci started the game for three and two-thirds innings with Jim Slovic, Jim Arnidis, and Milt Knouse as relief pitchers. All total, Juniata pitching struck out eight, walked eleven, and gave up thirteen hits.

The Indians hitters rallied in the seventh and eighth innings as they brought nine runs across the plate. The key play was a bases-loaded triple by Dan Browne with two outs to tie the game at 12-12.

Elizabethtown's winning run was scored when a third-base line drive went off the glove of Tom Streightiff to bring in the man already on second.

Tom Streightiff led the ball team with four hits out of five times at bat.

Juniata's win over Albright was credited to Jim Slovic who relieved Jim Arnidis in the sixth. Slovic is 3-0 from the mound.

The game was tied in the second inning 1-1. The Indians went ahead 3-1 with a sacrifice fly by Tom Streightiff and a run producing error on Craig Palardy's base hit. Albright rallied in the sixth to take the lead 4-3, but in the seventh Juniata tied as Palardy drilled a double and Ed McNeal followed with a triple. (Ed McNeal was the lead hitter with four hits out of five trips to home plate.) Jim Slovic's triple, and singles by Dan Browne and Dee Adcock prepared the winning run as Palardy's infield single hit Slovic home in the eight inning.

J.C. Tennis Looks For Even Season

The tennis team is on the verge of winessing their consecutive winning season streak halted at eight. After losing to Scranton 5-4, the team's record dipped to 3-5. Only by defeating Albright and Indiana can the netmen break even for the season.

During the Scranton match, Royal Greg Spotts bested Bruce Draper 6-4, 6-4. Pat White evened things a bit by defeating Pete Hurly 6-2, 7-6. The Royal netmen, Ed Scrap, beat Andy Vonderheyde by scores of 6-3, 6-7, and 7-5. Media Kim (Yes, Media Kim) took his opponent, Juniata's John Bowser by scores of 6-0, 7-5. Denny Buckwalter capped the singles by defeating his opponent, Rob Wiegande 6-1, 6-2.

In the doubles, the combo of Bowser - Draper and Ono - Vonderheyde won their matches, but Scranton managed to take the two left-over matches for their 5-4 win.

The team has felt the absence of Al Stout who was 9-0 last season. Pat White is the best player this year with a perfect 8-0 record.

J.C. Golfers Take Second in MAC's

by Vernne L. Wetzel

As of April 26, the Juniata Varsity Golf team has compiled a record of 6 wins, 0 losses, and 1 tie. The team consists of five returning lettermen and two freshmen. The golfers are: No. 1 golfer, Courtney Graham (Jr.); No. 2 golfer, Chuck Rahausey (Soph.); No. 3 golfer, Brian Clemens (Soph.); No. 4 golfer, Marty Dansbury (Soph.); No. 5 golfer, Tom Van Armer (Sr.); No. 6 golfer, Dale Shiffler (Fr.); and No. 7 golfer, Jay Enders (Fr.).

On Monday, April 24, Juniata played Carnegie-Mellon College and St. Francis College at the Huntingdon course. Juniata won easily with a total medal score of 380 strokes. Carnegie-Mellon posted 395 strokes, and St. Francis had 426 strokes. In medalist scoring, seven golfers play, and the lowest five scores are summed; the lowest number of strokes wins. Juniata's scorers were Courtney Graham 69 (1 underpar, Medalist Honors), Chuck Rahauser 78; Brian Clemens 75; Dale Shiffler 76, and Tom Van Armer 82. On Wednesday, April 26, Juniata met Thiel College at Huntingdon and tied them. Team scores were both 382 strokes. Juniata's scorers were Courtney Graham 76, Chuck Rahauser 69 (1 underpar, Medalist Honors), Brian Clemens 77, Marty Dansbury 78, and Tom Van Armer 82.

Trackmen Swamp Albright, Roll to 7-2 Record

by Tony Martuzas

Who says Juniata can't field winning teams? Coach Bunton's boys fulfilled their coaches expectations by learning to "the lean side of the win-loss column". In last Thursday's tri-meet against Gettysburg and St. Francis the J.C. trackmen racked up 107 points to distant Gettysburg's 62, and St. Francis could only manage 11.

Dave Sparks took the 100-yard dash and the 220 with times of 10.2 and 22.9. Chris Perry took the 440-yard dash with a 51.6 while Larry Hoover was clocked at 2:01.5 in the 880, and Denny Wiedler took first in the mile with his freshman teammate Brian Maurer trailing. Joe Coradetti took the 440 intermediate hurles again (he has only lost once) with a time of 57.7. In the shot put, Jim Willauer chucked the 16 pounder 43'8½" to take first in that event, Mike Slough took the long jump with a leap of 19'8½", Mike McVey cleared 12' in the pole vault, and Mark Dincher did 40'9" in the triple jump.

Against Albright, Alex Zubritsky earned his letter in track by taking the javelin against Albright. Other winners were Maurer and Wiedler, escorting each other to the tape with identical times of 4:39.5. Carl Koval (51.0), Chris Perry (51.9), and Brian Hoover (53.1) swept the 440 while Dave Sparks (10.05), Mike Slough (10.3), and Kent Laforme (10.45) swept the 100. Grant Brewin coasted to a 2:00.7 half (with Larry Hoover second, Craig Manhart third) and Joe Coradetti took the 440 IH with a 57.9 clocking. The final score for that meet was a lopsided 100-36 victory for JC.

Last Friday, Dave Sparks, Joe Coradetti, Chris Perry, and Mike Slough traveled to Philadelphia to take part in the Penn Relays. The runners were clocked at 43.7 in the 440 relay, a new school record.

With one meet left, the track team is more than ready to score high in the MAC Championships.

The highlight of the meeting was the presentation of the startling, revolutionary paper on triondynamics by J. G. Barredo which confirmed that the velocity of light is constant neither subquantically nor within the trion, a discovery which is sure to cause important changes in modern physical theory. When the scheduled meetings were not of interest (rarely) or simply too high-level to grasp (not so rarely), the members of the Juniata delegation toured the nation's capitol, spending much time at the Smithsonian Institution where they viewed various natural, artistic and scientific relics of the past.

The Physics Department is looking forward to sending a group to the 1373 meeting of the A.P.S., to be held in January in New York City.

Dr. Kihl Gives Paper On Urban Politics in S. Korea

by Henry Siedzikowski

On the weekend of April 11, 12; Dr. Young Kihl, of Juniata's political science department, presented a paper in conjunction with the Panel on Urban Politics. He was participating on this panel at the invitation of the Pennsylvania Political Science Association at their annual meeting at the Ben Franklin Hotel in Philadelphia.

Dr. Kihl's paper was one of two presented to the panel. His was entitled "Urban Political Competition and Allocation of Resources in the Case of South Korea." The other paper was on school desegregation decision-making in the Philadelphia area.

Dr. Kihl started the paper with the intent of testing and proving a hypothesis of his. His hypothesis was that large political support in a national election will cause political leadership to dispense resources as a punishment or reward to the constituents. However, by the analysis of his data from 32 South Korean cities, he ended up disproving this hypothesis.

He believes the findings are interesting because they can be used as a validation for American findings and findings in other countries, mostly West European. Dr. Kihl's result raise some questions as to the validity of some of the current American findings.

This paper was a part of a research project which Dr. Kihl has been working on for the past three years. The research project is on Competitive Party Politics and Urbanization in South Korea. At the present, he has two papers completed, and is in the process of doing several others. One of his concerns is the degree to economic development and political democracy are positively related on the community level.

Readers capture Characters in Reading Festival

by Tom Alessi

Juniata's Spring Reading Festival concluded Monday night in Shoemaker Gallery as three students, David Bombaugh, Bill Dick, and Pete Eisenberg, managed to salvage the program from mediocrity. The varied, diligently prepared, and well performed program made the previous readings appear stagnant and stale. Each of the readers captured the character and atmosphere of their piece with great precision.

David Bombaugh began the program with an excerpt from Winnie the Pooh by A. A. Milne. The intimate audience was apprehended by Bombaugh's ability to portray the three different characters used in Pooh's attenuated - honey - procurement scene from which Pooh allegedly received his name.

Selections from The Cotton Patch Version of the New Testament translated by Clarence Jordan were subject to Bill Dick's oral interpretation. Dick chose the letters of Peter, Paul, James, and First John, distinguishing between the four characters with great insight. The letters, written in southern dialect, gave humorous and enlighting translations of the foundations of Christianity.

The "Stage Manager" in Thornton Wilder's "Our Town" was portrayed by Pete Eisenberg. In his description of Grover's Corners. Eisenberg, as the "Stage Manager," transported the onlookers into New England 70 years ago.

The nearly flawless presentations were long enough to make their point and short enough to preserve the awareness of the audience while the change of readers gave the program movement. The more than twelve-hundred people who did not attend missed an enjoyable and illuminating experience.

Student Gov't. Meeting Discusses Projects For Coming Year

by Henry Siedzikowski

On Wednesday, May 3, the recently elected Student Government conducted its second meeting. The agenda consisted of several projects that must be concluded for the year, and also, several ideas that hopefully will be implemented next year.

One problem under consideration, is the finding of a new nickname for the Juniata sports teams. Any student with a serious suggestion is urged to stop in the student government office and let a senator know about it.

The Student Government also also took action to solve a problem which has existed with the student government office, namely that it is very seldom opened. So, for the rest of the year, a schedule was set up so that the office will be open between 6:30 and 7:30 every evening but Saturday, to allow any student who has anything to say, a chance to come and say it to someone who may be able to do something about it.

In another effort to increase com-

GRASS ROOTS

Compiled by Kim Hershberger and Sue Lowry

Each week, the Grass Roots staff selects, at random, the name of a Juniata Student, and asks him to contribute an article, impromptu, concerning anything he chooses. What follows is the result of this week's chance soliciting:

Dear Fellow Human Beings

Mankind does not have another 2000 years to learn how to love one another. As long as war continues to mar our existence we can never hope to achieve an agape relationship with each other.

We, as people of nations, must learn to disspell certain philosophies which tend to kindle the spark to destruction between nations. Specifically, we as Americans have to sacrifice our feelings of arrogance before we can resolve the Vietnam conflict Our military- industrial complex has conditioned many of us to feel the necessity to fight until our honor is achieved. If we as a nation cannot stop such an ethnocentric impulse, how can we expect other nations to curb their appetites for honor.

I urge all humanity to utilize every means which is in keeping with each individual's conscience, to achieve the goal of peace and love throughout the world. All we are asking is give peace a chance.

Love,
a fellow human being

Carousel Tops Off Successful Weekend

by Susan Lowry

Time, talent and enthusiasm are essential ingredients in any musical or theatrical production and Juniata's rendition of Rogers and Hammerstein's Carousel, possessed an abundance of each. The work and efforts of the cast and crews alike proved well worthwhile as the play was presented Friday and Saturday nights to the general public. The play was an endeavor of the Department of Music with student Dave Bombaugh as producer and Susan Hockenberry as his assistant. Bruce Hirsch was musical director, assisted by Phillip Simmons; Mrs. Majorie Hirsch, stage director; and Judith Rosen, choreographer.

A prelude introduces the play to the audience, with the cast dancing in the aisles, enticing comers to join them at the carnival. As Act I opens we meet Billy Bigelow, the central character as portrayed by William Dick. Billy is a carousel barker on the midway of a small carnival located somewhere in New England and has built himself quite a reputation as a lady's man. But his fancies turn to Julie, a local textile-mill worker, and he soon finds himself married and financially responsible for a wife and expected baby. By this time, he has lost his job due to a jealous streak running through his female boss and now feels he is a failure in life. He confides in Jigger, a bit of a shady character, and they contrive a robbery together but their attempt fails. Rather than being captured Billy stabs himself to death. He awakes to find himself in the backyard of heaven and begins a conversation with the Heavenly Friend. Billy learns that he is unable to enter heaven since his life was so devoid of good and he is granted permission to return to earth to perform a redeeming deed to gain him entrance. The final scene closes as Billy helps his daughter realize that her own life is not restricted by her parents' failures but is her own to develop as she wants.

Four major roles were double-casted in order to permit greater student participation. Lynn Smires and Shirley Strock shared the female lead of Julie. Beth Wagner and Debbie Trotter played Carrie Pipperidge, a close friend of Julie's and her fiance Enoch Snow was portrayed by Jody Harpster and Phil Woodworth. Finally, Nettie Fowler is performed by Beth Coughenour and Barbara Hunt. Featured in other primary roles are Chris Huber, as Jigger; and Steve Glass and Pete Eisenberg as Heavenly Friend and Starkeeper respectively and Judy Rosen as Billy's daughter, Louise.

The sets used for the production were simple in design but very effective. The costumes were in most cases made by the students and materials were provided by Richard Textiles. The musical background was provided by college musicians.

The entire production was received extremely well by all who attended and in many instances, members of the audience viewed the performance both nights. The musical will be presented again Commencement Weekend for the benefit of the parents of senior performers who will be in Huntingdon for graduation ceremonies.

Hallmark Management Service Takes Place of Broughton

Effective June 1, 1972, the food service in Baker Refectory of Ellis Hall will be conducted by Hallmark Management Service of Mansfield, Ohio, to replace Broughton Food Service of Marietta, Ohio. It is our opinion that this change is necessary to achieve the improvement in quality of food and of service that we desire for students, faculty, and campus guests. Our decision to do this was not taken lightly; it included thorough investigation of the new catering firm.

It is important to emphasize that the cooks, waitresses, and others employed below the supervisory level by Broughton Food Service will be given employment by Hallmark.

The recommendation for this change was made by Mr. Floyd A. Roller, Business Manager and Controller, and Mr. Thomas B. Robinson, Acting Dean of Students. A number of students were involved in the recommendation, including three who made a trip to Ohio with Mr. Roller and Mr. Robinson to investigate several food services. These students were Miss Deborah Welch, Miss Susan Longstreet and Mr. David Baer.

We recognize that the quality of food and service are affected greatly by the ability and experience of the local manager. Much depends also upon the supervision, training procedures, and management policies of the catering firm itself.

Hallmark is a new company but because of the background of its people we have concluded that they have the capacity and experience necessary to achieve the improvements that are desired. One important purpose that we have had in mind is to achieve improvement without increasing college fees previously announced for 1972-73. We are now confident that this can be accomplished.

Another important understanding with the new company is that they will work closely with a student dining hall committee so that student opinion may be taken fully into account in the food service operation.

JUNIATIAN READERS

With this the concluding issue of the Juniatian for the 1971-72 school year we on the staff wish to thank all those who helped in the paper's reestablishment. Many students, faculty, alumni, administration, and friends will never receive the recognition due to them. Without their help, the Juniatian could never have achieved the successes it did in this, the year of its rebirth.

Ear of the Needle

by Bob Kraut

Richard Harris My Boy Dunhill DSX-50116

I'm a sucker for the romantic. I'll admit it. Sit me in front of the fire place, give me a bottle of Chivas Regal, try a little tenderness, and ol' Bob just turns to mush inside. Perhaps that's why I'm a bit of a fanatic when it comes to Richard Harris. He got me started in Camelot, turned me on withMacArthur Park, and is now here with My Boy.

Never one to sing mundane pop tunes, the Harris voice is so expressive that it transcends that narrow milieu. And his albums are always conceptual; revolving around that universal theme L-O-V-E.

MacArthur Park was a monument. It established Jim Webb as a master shaper of songs. Who else could have written "Phoenix" for Glen Campbell, then turned around to pen "Park" for Richard Harris without compromising a note? It was Webb's vehicle A Tramp Shining that carried Harris to recording stardom in '68. His second effort for Richard The Yard Went on Forever is, in my opinion, superior to his first, but for some strange reason went largely unnoticed. I was a bit apprehensive about picking up My Boy because it contained only four Webb tunes. Figuring that one song from Jim Webb is often worth the price of an entire album, I bought it. And I'm glad I did. Delighted am I to report that Harris has done it once again. The album concept is his own, and revolves around a man meeting a girl named Beth who he thinks he could love. They marry, have a son and she leaves him, but Harris pledges to stay until his son has grown up enough to face the world on his own. The final statement concerns his life and his disillusionment. Although it may sound quite soap opera-ish listening to Richard Harris sing it, turns one all syrupy.

In style, Richard Harris is descended from a long line of British stage performers, marvelous actors turned singers like: Cyril Richard, Richard Burton, and of course Rex Harrison. And his appeal is along one of the widest bases known. Women envision him as King Arthur, men know he's no damn sissy, the old folks recognize those powerful theatrical talents, and the young admire his bravura for life. Richard Harris stories are legend, like the time he and Jason Robards, Jr. landed in the hospital attempting to drink a swimming pool. This is the man those Schlitz commericials claiming "You only go 'round once in life. . ." had in mind.

So if perchance you're in the mood for romance, I say "Let Richard do it!". . . the singing that is. Now if only Peter O'Toole and Jim Webb would cross paths.

May Day Weekend: One of the Best Of the Year

by Jean Pollock

This first weekend in May was a big one for the Juniata campus. On Friday and Saturday evenings students and visitors enjoyed the musical, "Carousel", presented by the music department. The two day Spring Carnival, set up in Cloister parking lot, drew a considerable crowd. One could find amusement throwing darts, riding the ferris wheel, coaxing frogs to jump, pitching nickels at glasses, and climbing a very tedious rope ladder in order to reach a five dollar bill but ending up in the foam rubber padding instead. The several refreshment stands remedied any appetites, the most notable being English Tom's Soco Tocos. Mudd Ramp provided the music for the street dance from 6:00 to 8:00 Saturday evening and later that night WC played for the formal May Day dance. All in all a successful and enjoyable weekend.

Lime

by Edward Kinchley Evans

When Circle In The Square was still on Sheridan Square in Greenwich Village in New York City and was under the personal direction of Jose Quintero, the play by Eugene O'Neill called "The Iceman Cometh" was being produced and introducing a new young actor, Jason Robards, Jr. What was crippling the production was a Broadway onslaught of restrictions imposed in an attempt to abort what was at that time the birthing of Off-Broadway. To use Equity actors and to be reviewed by the Union run —newspapers (i.e. The Times, The Herald Tribune, The Post, The World Telegraph and Sun, The Daily News, The Mirror, etc.) . . . . there had to be a Union light man hired to run the stage lights. The man they sent down was in his dotage and of such little help (at a salary of $150 plus a week) that Jose ended up using his local boys minus salary and the old man who was past his time and prime sat in the back and read comics for the running of the show. So much for tenure. An institution with an electrifying faculty attracts students like a magnet. One gets the impression that if you got too close to either Bruce or Marjorie Hirsch you would be hazarding shock. Bruce Davis is another dyname of energy that generates student attraction. These kind of marvelous people never have to worry about work, coney yes, work never. And the work they involve themselves with have an immedieacy for the students of today. . .not fifty years ago. . .but today in today's world of changing values and concepts.

Which brings me to the subject at hand and how a prejudice caught in years gone by can with brilliant handling be cured over night by professionals. I came to the Friday evening (May 5) performance of "Carousel" prepared to hate it. In the 1950's Rodgers and Hammerstein made a career of drowning the institution of marriage in high C's and low humidity. The last time I was exposed to this particular batch of sorghum was back in 1956 when Gordon MacRae and Shirley Jones stick-stepped their way through all that sickening mess until finally with one blurp they sank beneath it's surface. Just the memory of Billy Bigelow's soliluqy about "my son Bill. . ." gives me the dry heaves. . .

And to add insult to imagined injury, the program was being dedicated to the memory of a student from the production that Life in it's infinite impersonalness had taken from us. What a terrible burden to place upon the shoulders of the replacement and even with the best of intentions and respect, wasn't that stacking the cards for audience appeal and sympathy for production? Juniata is a small select, intimate college that gives personalized attention which larger establishment no longer can afford. Was this an extension of this unique quality and could we look forward to it being projected towards other fields of endeavor? Such as dedicating a football or basketball game it one of the players was recalled by the Master, or, to put it on an equally embarrassing plane, why not a field trip for a lost Geology major? I have known death in my personal life and it is a pri-

Members of College Community Elected As Officials of Jaycees

Irvin R. Thomas, manager of the Juniata College Print Shop, was recently elected president of the Huntingdon Jaycee organization. Elected with him was David Kreider, administrative assistant to the executive director of development, as director of publicity; and The Rev. Andrew Murray, campus minister, as chaplain. The new officers assumed office on May 1.

Thomas said he had over 40 programs planned for his organization costing about $18,000. Among the projects planned for the good of the community is a new "Tot Lot" similar to the one constructed at 13th and Washington Sts. Among the popular annual events sponsored by this active group of young men are the Annual Bloodmobile Visit, the Halloween Parade, a Christmas Parade and the Christmas House with a live Santa.

The following members are from the College community: William Asendorf, associate director of admissions; William Berrier, assistant to the dean of students; Donald McClain, accounting office clerk; Dr. Richard Montgomery, assistant professor of economics; David Rieker, director of publicity; Floyd Roller, business manager and controller; Harry Salter, manager of data processing; and Dennis Kritsky, manager of food services.

It's just marvelous to be Sensitive. I mean, you Notice so much, and when there's writing to be done, like this review of "Bangladesh" (the MOVIE, dearie, not the ak-ak gore of the socio-political maelstrom we tried not to notice on the glaring eye or is it really a boob, tube?), why enlist someone who might Muff it, when a first-rate Aesthete can come down the chimney bearing a great sack of rhetorical chocolate eggs?

Eons ago, when other archangels my age were so successfully disguised to their parents as children, and a penny would buy a dime novel to be hidden in the corncrib (yes, right here in River City!) I was lulled by the music of aphids plying their sorties among my grandmother's nasturtiums on a summer's afternoon, while the town's bullies and pint-sized curmudgeons played with those miniaturized versions of doom—objects perpetrated by the real-adult-horror world: guns. Philistines! Had they no grasp of the ephemeral? How could they, or for that matter, I, know that "somewhere ages and ages hence" (that's Sandburg, for those of you who were born within 50 miles of Here) (in this case, Here being There, or Wherever) I would become the interpreter of Creative Effort, albeit via a small college newspaper. Should I ever try to describe the emanations that pervaded the theatre when Billy Preston juxtaposed his totally spontaneous and thus utterly unrehearsed dance into his composition "That's the Way God Wants It To Be"? Pivotal. Utterly quintessential, yet, alas, pitiable as Dance, per se, yes, vate affair. It takes several seasons for the loss of a loved one to be reconciled and to be able to look objectively at other's concern and love. Would it have not been more in sympathy to have waited a year to inaugurate a memorial to his memory? At least it would have given his family or those who truly loved him time to adjust to this grievous loss.

So, I went not unprejudiced. I was still piqued by the Christmas bit when we were force fed Thanksgiving leftovers and not delighted with a program conceived especially for this Winter Bright Season. A Christmas program in a Christmas program is a Christmas program and not one which you have all dressed up rehearsed and no place to go.

It took me five minutes after the curtain went up to spit in the eye of my discontent. I thoroughly enjoyed every bright minute of it (except the first few seconds of the daughter's ballet which seemed out of character and I blanked out the . ."my son Bill' bit for safety's sake. .) . . . but otherwise an excellent evening of theatre.

The girl who played Julie Jordan is God's gift to confuse all us misanthropes. Her intelligence, independance, and beauty lifted "Carousel" back to it's original Molnar truth and you try to sustain an evening the delicate balance the role calls for in keeping that much goodness from teetertottering into the mess Shirley Jones made of the role.

It has been rumored that Marjorie Hirsch is a difficult woman to please. Thank God someone is. You don't get this type of student vitality from bland, unemotional bodies who reside in the cemetaries of the past. This Hirsch crew has things to do and you better move fast or you'll find yourself shouting and singing right along with them!

Post Script: The basic problem of education is to get you so interested in the process of thinking that you start to explore the realm of your own mind. The last I voted was when the choice was between Stevenson and Eisenhower. Stevenson was telling us to think for ourselves. Eisenhower said he would go to Korea. America is still paying for that trip. A National election is coming up and these men have power over your bodies. Use your head to think with and vote accordingly. You can change the world for a better tomorrow.

Pro-Con: Pro-Con Column

"Pro and Con Column"

The Pro and Con Column now sets itself up for constructive criticisim. Before going any further we would like to quote our purpose as stated in VL.XLVIII, No. 3 of The Juniatian.

"Pro and Con offers no solutions. It is your forum. If you only become more aware, more concerned about the issues that affect us, Pro and Con has served its purpose."

It has never been the personal responsibility of the authors of this column to bring about any change. We hoped that the column, however, would present the issues to the people in the positions to make changes.

"The column is, and always has been superficial and inconclusive. The opinions of the students expressed in the column are nothing more than that: unbased opinion. At that, the opinions expressed usually appear to be hastilty developed, simply so that the column can be written. Little authoritative information pertinent to the subject has been included; most often, the feature is more of a humor column. Of course, I realize that this is not totally the authors' fault, since they require student participation, which is difficult to find in any significant amounts. But, unfortunately, the column does not present the total scope of possible considerations as much as it should have."—John Knouse.

"I feel it's interesting only because I look for people I know. I also feel that the column doesn't present relevant subject. It should have broadened its scope to encompass national affairs. Juniata's problems are too miniscule to worry about."—Nancy Kohler.

"Often it is an interesting column but it does little to provoke action on the subjects. For example. smoking in the dining hall was discussed but the rule has yet to be enforced or changed to allow smoking."—Jim McCartney.

"It is a good thing to help students sound off and help other students see how their peers think on a particular subject. But sometimes it deals with trivial matters which can't be helped one way or another."—Lee Young.

"It is the most interesting part of an otherwise dull and newsless paper—which still isn't saying much."—Dick Borton.

"It is Pro and Con because both sides have to be presented. The point is to make the reader see both sides of the issue. For example, no one can decide whether or not you should be allowed to walk on the grass! the choice is up to the individual. The column's humor made it enjoyable reading."—Sharon Chilcote.

"I think it was interesting and well written. I really didn't expect it to solve any problems."— Kim Hershberger.

"I always pick up the paper after a mealtime, and after a meal at Ellis Hall I could use a good laugh. I do enjoy reading the column."— Bob Wise.

"I really expected it to be a forum—just what it was."—Nancy Tambura.

"Although it is not conducive to change, I like the column because of the sarcasm in the beginning and humor throughout the article. It is different from the same old regular articles in the newspaper."—Debbie Evans.

At this time the Pro and Con column would like to thank all the contributors to this feature. And thank you, readers.

munication with the students, the Student Government will start dorm visitations during this week. This policy will continue into next year, with every dorm being visited every other week. Hopefully, students will take this opportunity to let the government know their suggestions and complaints.

In the process of construction, is a new student handbook to be published by student government. It will probably be put out along with the Pathfinder, but will be oriented towards telling students what Juniata is really like, rather that a listing of administration policy. The handbook will include such things as what places downtown that give students the best service.

The final business for the meeting was a review of proposals for next years budget. However, there will be further investigation of the proposals, before one is made official.

GOOD OLE DAYS MAY 20, 1931
THE TOMAHAWK

Ho Hum Spring is really here to stay— What?— it has been here? My— I'm late— but then— only the other day I heard the McTavishes threw out their Christmas Tree.

May Day—Color—and didn't the green and white surrounding the "throne" look cheeseclothy? Now of course my aesthetic sense may not be —etc. —etc.

"Just like a breath of—?—" tripped Lou Miller over the rolling green — and brown — and bare — of North Campus. And can you imagine! he didn't have her shoes on! Oh—if her mother only knew.

I hope our over the weekend visitors enjoyed the different kind of meal that was usually get beans for supper on Saturday. Oh, no!

"Take two; they're small" cracks some wise cracker when two Pretzels confronted Margie on Saturday on the walk.

Oh—What joy it would give if next week Tommy could read Yesterday immediately after chapel, the students tiring of continuing remarks being made during chapel addresses took one named Oscar and tore him limb from limb in front of campus.

Old Chappy—really it behooves one to say in all politeness, "Keep your mouth shut, will ya!

As 27 aeroplanes roared overhead Dr. MacKenzie and his Criminology class almost rolled out the window—and below the managing editor of this paper was heard to say with a deep voice, "Gee—I wish I was a pilot"! Oh, well—as the old saying goes, children—

"We are still graduating green seniors," remarks Dr. I. Harvey. Whew! I'm glad he said it before they left. I thought nobody would ever tell them. Now seniors, ahem—alumni—ahem—

"She may be small, but there are those who love her," said Webster. Dr. I. Harvey repeated the words in History of Ed. class and M.J. looked bewildered for a while, and then chuckled and chuckled, —heh —now listen. I only meant Webster knew all about it—now listen—

Maybe too much said—well— as the good old Spaniard said, as a choking feeling crept into his throat. .

JC Misses Title By 1 Point; PMC Finishes On Top

by Tony Martuzas

The Indian (no defamation intended) trackman almost walked away with the MAC Track Championship. The controversey entered around the 440 Intermediate Hurdle event with Joe Coradetti taking second and setting a new school record with a time of 54.3. Mike Slough came in fourth which would have given the Indians the winning edge for the Title. Mike was disqualified because an official ruled his foot was not going over the hurdle legally The official claimed he was jumping ovee thr side of the hurdle instead of going directly over it. That fourth place finish would have given the trackmen two points, enough to take first place away from PMC. The team finished with 42 points, just one point behind the winning team, PMC, which had 43 points.

In other events, Bob Zimmerman, partially recovered from a thigh injury, took first place in the pole vault. Coach Rabine remarked, "He did it on sheer guts. He lacked the speed down the runway, but he just got himself over by sheer guts". Vince Yaniga took fourth in the shot put with a chuck of 45'-½". Craig Nishyiama took fifth in the javelin with a toss of 179'6". Joe Coradetti, the "ironman" of the squad (He ran in the 440 IH Hurdles, 440 relay, long jump, mile relay, and triple jump) took fourth in the long jump with a 22'1" leap. He also took second in the triple jump with a measured 45'2½".

In the track events, Carl Koval again broke the school record in the 880 yd. run with a 1:56.5 clocking. He also took third place during that very tight race to the tape. The 440 relay, composed of Dave Sparks, Joe Coradetti, Chris Perry, and Mike Slough, placed second with a time of 43 seconds. Denny Wiedler took second in the mile with a 4:22.1 timing, while frosh teammate Brian Maurer took third with a 4:22.4. Brian also took fifth place in the two mile run with a 9:46.9 timing. Joe Coradetti, Chris Perry, Mike Slough and Carl Koval combined to take second in the mile relay and set a new school record with a 3:21.7 clocking, just one-tenth of a second behind the first-placed team. Dave Sparks took fifth in the 100 yd dash with a 10.0, but the day before he set a new school record of 9.8 seconds for that event. Dave came right back and took third in the 220 with a time of 23.0 seconds.

So, the JC Track Team finished with a very impressive 8-2 record and they were barely edged out in the MAC Championships. Only Denny Weidler, Dave Sparks, Chris Perry, and Craig Nishiyama will be lost due to graduation. But Joe Coradetti, Mike Slough, Carl Koval, Brian Maurer, Mike Winterstein, Ron Tomcavage, Bob Zimmerman and all the rest will be back next year for the 1973 Track Season.

Golf Team Ends Season with Flawless Record

Juniata journeyed to Albright College to play a triangular match with Albright and Wilkes. Wilkes had beaten Juniata by a single stroke at the MAC's so this was a big match for all three teams. The conditions were bad (high winds and cold weather) and the linkmen's scores soared. Juniata won both matches beating Wilkes by 6 strokes and Albright by 11 strokes.

J.C. can look forward to a promising year for the 1973 golf season because they lose only one man — Senior captain Tommy Van Ormer. Tom's leadership ability was a great asset to the team and they wish him the best of luck in the future.

Coach Bill German has the honor of being the only undefeated coach this year at Juniata. His ability in guiding the linksmen should ensure an even better team next year.

Juniata Drops Both to Deleware Valley In Double Header On Saturday

by Tony Martuzas

The Indians Baseball team took Friday's game 8-4 over Susquehannah, which looked as though the Indians had a playoff spot sealed. Delaware Valley ended their hopes as Juniata dropped the first game 6-5 (which automatically ended the playoff hopes), and the next 5-3.

Indian second baseman Mike McNeal, unloaded in the second inning with a 400 foot home run over the left field fence. Susquehannah's rightfielder Eckman, grabbed hold of a Mark Amatucci pitch and sent it soaring over the left field fence, almost identical to McNeal's shot. Going into the bottom of the fourth inning, the score was knotted, 1-1.

When the Indians came to bat, Graig Palardy led off with a smash to left field. Craig took second as the ball escaped Crusader's catcher's grasp. Mike McNeal, the next batter, drew his first walk of the game. Karl Bergstresser's shot over the shortstop's head sent Craig home, which broke the deadlock.

Juniata picked up another run in the seventh. Mike McNeal started things off when he was walked for the second time(He came into the game with 12 walks). Karl Bergstresser sent Mike McNeal all the way to third on his single. With Dan Browne at bat, Karl broke towards second but abruptly broke off, getting trapped in the run down. It looked like an obvious setup. It was as Crusader second baseman Popovec kept his eyes on McNeal at third, waiting for his to break for the plate. Mike took off and the throw was not in time. That run put the Indians up by two.

The Indians picked up five runs in the seventh, the first coming from Lou Eckerl as he slid home after a wild pitch by pitcher Harris. With bases loaded, Mike McNeal caught hold of Harris's pitch and sent it soaring over the left field fence. McNeal's grand slam put the game out of reach for Susquehannah, it looked as though Delaware Valley would be Juniata's next victims.

Well, there's no happy ending for this story. The opening game of Saturday's doubleheader had the lead exchanged several times for both teams. After the Aggies tied the game in the seventh, they finally got the go-ahead and Winning run as two Indian infielders suffered a bit of misfortune. Freshman third baseman Tom Streightiff lost the handle of a ground ball, which allowed the go-ahead run to reach third base. Craig Palardy, the shortstop with a riflearm, bobbled a sharp hit ground ball which allowed the winning run to score. The loss eliminated the team from entering the MAC playoffs.

The Indians, not letting the playoff elimination get them down, came back to lead the Aggies 3-2 after five innings. Aggie pitcher Bob Palinsky, won his own game by sending Tom Dabrowski home on his single.

Did sex sit at the head of the table in your household? But more about that later.

"Bangladesh," the movie. (not the album . . . . I'll review that in a future column that will contain an account of my vision of Redemption acquired the time I tripped on a box of animal crackers in Philadelphia's 30th Street Station) is one of those Flicks (dare I conjure up the pejorative?) our generation must consign to oblivion. At the risk of offending the youthful Cognescenti amoung my readers, I will get around to saying that I mean I found the plot terribly, well, just dreadfully trite. To wit, a hirsute, disenfranchised guitar player (a thinly disguised Beatle, as Jonas Megas has ventured?) appears in concert with a group of what pass for musicians in these latter days of the saints who long ago marched OUT. As the cameras (those voyeurs whose plastic insides will later spew forth a visual documentation of all events to which they were exposed) grind away, we see Eric Clapton suggestively skewer his cigaret on the E string of his guitar, calling to mind Rilke's rather unforgettable comment on Freud's symbolic interpretation of things in general. "Rather, indeed," Rilke leered.

Group after group, singer after singer, appears during this cinematic fiasco. "When will something HAPPen?" the viewer asks himself. Almost as if in answer, someone behind him murmurs, "Can analysis be worthwhile? Is the theatre really dead?" Leon Russell, looking dolefully ambisextrous, and Bob Dylan, Levied to the teeth, are welcome additions to the cast, but do little to relieve the seemingly incontestable cacaphony. One is hard put to connect this effort to the truly Great Masterpieces of cinematic Art, but, alas, alack, "Bangladesh" is wretchedly without precedent. Perhaps blessedly so. One's brow seems furrowed with effort . . . . even seers are at a loss for succinctness.

Lillies of this valley, dangle not thy tendrils in this movie's miasmic midst. This is the advice of a well-wisher who has only the precious interests of Great Art at heart. Eschew obfuscation, commit thyself and thy soul to Truth: stay at home, save your money, keep those cards and letters coming in, and above all, Crave Cultcha. . . . in a world gone almost certainly BLOTTO, only Cultcha can help us Cope. Ask for it by name.

Campus Minister Leads Anti-Vietnam War March

by Patrick Minnick

An old issue regained some of it's lost prominence on the Juniata scene May 4 when Campus Minister Andy Murry led a contingent of Juniata students in a vigil for peace in Vietnam. The group of about 25 students left Ellis Hall at 11:30 Thursday morning and walked to the Saint James Lutheran Church where the rally was held.

The general purpose of the vigil was "to demonstrate that the war question is not over," according to organizer Murray. The more specific point of protest is the expansion of bombing in Vietnam by the Nixon Administration. Although the war is theoretically winding down as evidenced by troop withdrawals, the air war is escalating to a higher level than ever before. According to the Washington Post, the Nixon Administration is throwing an average of one ton of bombs per minute at "targets" in Indochina. Lyndon Johnson as president drew a large amount of criticism and paid a price politically because of his role in the bombing issue, yet his record as number one bomb dropper has been superseded by the present administration's bomb-every -minute average.

The rally Thursday proposed to serve as a chance for those people who are interested in the war issue to review their feelings on it and a chance for those who have lost interest in the question to revive their concern in light of the deeper U.S. involvement in the air war. The reaction of the majority of people both on campus and especially in Huntingdon was basically apathetic.

Prior to the vigil, an advertisement for it had been announced over WHUN radio repeatedly, yet excluding the Huntingdon clergy which was represented by eight local ministers at the rally, fewer than eight members of the local populace not connected with the campus, appeared at the vigil. Campus Minister Murray was reasonably disappointed by the sparse turnout, but not discouraged. He feels that these small demonstrations against the war will serve as the beginnings for larger and more activistic gatherings in much the same way as the small rallies did in the early days of the peace movement, if the United States policy in indochina does not change notably.

The vigil itself was of necessity, loosely structured as participants discussed the problem while background music from a record player filled in the empty spaces. Readings which are concerned with the war issue, were also given from relevant sources in literature and scripture.

Leadership Conf. Initiates New Ideas

Bob Jubelirer, Chairman of the Penna. Young Republicans and member of the Committee to re-elect the President.

by Henry Siedzikowski

This year, Juniata College's annual Leadership Conference took on a new dimension. Instead of having only Juniata's student leaders there, invitations were sent out to seventeen other private colleges in Pennsylvania having approximately the same enrollment as Juniata.

The response from other colleges was better than expected, and so on the afternoon of Wednesday, September 16, the conference began. The conference was held at Camp Blue Diamond.

Juniata as was to be expected, had the largest delegation at the conference, a total of around fifteen representatives. However, colleges such as Gettysburg, Albright, Robert Morris, and Westminister sent representatives. They were usually represented by one or two students.

Wednesday afternoon was spent getting to know all the new faces. Recreation and general discussions were the preliminaries to a long night of speakers and workshops.

After dinner the conference split into two groups. One group listened to a short speech by Blair County Assistant D.A., Paul Foreman. His basic topic was student legal rights. The other group listened to a talk by Mrs. Harriet Richardson, a Family Planning Center Representative. Her talk centered on the topic of sex on the college campus. Both talks were followed by an informal discussion where many questions and problems from the various colleges were brought to light.

Following this came the keynote speakers. First was a McGovern Regional Coordinator from California, Donald Ross. Mr. Ross was available because he is in Pennsylvania for the upcoming presidential campaign.

Young Republicans. After the speeches there was a chance for informal discussion with both men.

The next day was spent in workshops that varied in topic material from drinking, contraception and abortion to communications, governance and student legal rights. It provided an opportunity for the different colleges to share experiences and ideas on all of these topics.

The final action of the conference was to adopt several resolutions. Each had to be adopted by at least a two-thirds majority of those present. They were as follows:

1. The name officially given to the conference is the First Annual Student Leadership Conference of Pennsylvania Small Private Colleges.
2. We believe the current drinking age of 21 years in Pennsylvania is unconstitutional since all the other various rights granted by the Pennsylvania legislature would indicate the 18 year old should be permitted the right to drink.
3. We resolve that College

Kings to Present Concert

Dr. Robert King and Mary King, of the music faculty, received a grant from the state of Michigan this summer to assist in the annual series of chamber music concerts presented in Manistique and Escanaba, in the Upper Pennisula of the state. The Kings have presented a series of concerts for the past five years and have found an enthusiastic reception and larger and larger audiences in an area with virtually no previous exposure to chamber music.

In response to demand, Dr. and Mrs. King performed six concerts this past summer with the collaboration of other instrumentalists from Cleveland, Berkeley, and Ithaca, N.Y. Included among these were two concerts devoted to "popular" music and, one centered around sacred music for chamber music combinations. Three other concerts were of the more conventional type and a separate concert was presented, where the presentation received special commendation in the editorial page of the Escanaba "Daily News".

A special feature of one concert was a work commissioned by Dr. King for the performers in the series. Frederick Thayer, a young American composer, composed a quintet for strings and oboe which he analysed for the audience before the performance.

The Kings, along with other members of the Music Department and guest artists, will again present a series of chamber music concerts on campus. An announcement of works to be performed and guest artists will be made shortly.

What's Happening?

With this being the last issue in September, along with a lack of calenders given to the students this year, we thought it might be helpful to have a brief rundown on what's happening in October.

There will be four football games in October. Only the one on Oct. 7 is away. Homecoming is Oct. 14. A concert with Seatrain will highlight that weekend on Saturday night, with a film on Friday night and a coffeehouse on Sunday night.

Parents Weekend comes along on Oct. 27, 28, & 29. A home football game against Grove City will be the highlight of our parents visitation, but the play, "You're a Good Man Charlie Brown", will be presented on Friday and Saturday nights so that students may find it easier to entertain their parents.

The weekend in between these two features a home football game, but it is also the weekend of the Student Government Colloquy. That will be held all day Friday and Saturday.

In between all these big weekends will be numerous other events, the schedule for which can be found in the Campus Crier. And in closing, let us just make mention of the fact that Oct. 19 is Mountain Day. So have fun in October.

Student Government Commences Activities

by Cindy Sacserba

The student government project line-up began with Encounter '72 commencing on September 21. Continuing every other Thursday night at 7:30 in the Ellis Hall ballroom. Encounter '72 will feature students informally discussing various topics with professors, congressmen from the district and representatives for presidential, candidates, draft counselors, and family planning advisors.

The drive on voter registration is being executed. Car pools will be available to transport students to down-town Huntingdon in order to register. The deadline date to register is October 10.

The all day colloquy for October 20 and 21 will feature Senator Mike Gravel from Alaska and Mrs. Wheeling, Executive Director of Nader's Raiders. Her topic will be "Environment and Consumer Protection." Tentative speakers are Senator James Buckley, Senator Hugh Scott or Congressman Ashbrooke. Speeches will be given at night with workshops in session during the day.

Encounter '72 Series Starts With Debate

by Sue Blum

If you were to have stumbled into the Ellis Hall Ballroom at approximately 8 o'clock on Thursday, September 21, you would have found a very intricate debate going on. And if you could bear the agony of staying long enough you would have found Dr. Cherry and his colleague Mr. Lakso debating over the economic policies of President Nixon and Senator McGovern. The student gov't was presenting the first in it's "Encounter "72" lecture series. The turnout was fairly decent and the debate gave a chance to the students to confront the teachers with their own opinions.

Mr. Lakso took his stand in sympathy with McGovern's economic policies while Dr. Cherry defended the President's. Mr. Lakso claimed that the argument was one of redistribution proposing a reduction of the defense budget so that the spending budget would be higher and allocated in other places. Dr. Cherry believed that the problem was a transitional one and questioned as to whether this could be done in a highly complexed society. There would be a great impact upon jobs which are centralized around the defense budget. Mr. Lakso replied by making a comparison of the cutdown in the defense budget to waging a war on the Mafia making unemployment rise. Other questions raised included ones such as whether McGovern's promise of a 1,000 dollar tax free income given to every man would have an effect on the economy? The final question left in the air was how to cut up the existing pie a little differently so as to help the poor if you think that is justifiable. So come and argue and voice your opinions at the next exhausting and intricate lecture series.

The schedule is flexible and the atmosphere informal so you might happen to stumble right on in to another heavy debate if you aren't careful.

Bader To Head College Center

by Patrick Minnick

For the new year, Juniata has a new Director of the College Center (Ellis Hall) and Student Activities Program in the person of Bruce Bader. The college is not new to Bruce who graduated here in 1970 and served as Assistant Director of Admissions before and after a stint with the Marines as a reserve officer.

The basic college center programs will continue as in the past. Bruce along with the Center Board will arrange big-name concerts, Coffee house entertainment in the snack bar, rock dances, art shows, Homecoming, and the Spring Raft Regatta. For the information of freshmen and those upperclassmen who many not know, the Center Board is composed of students, elected by the student body to help run Ellis and provide activities for the school.

The first, and hopefully not the last, big name concert for this year will be Seatrain, which will appear at our campus on October 14. Tickets will be available prior to the concert for $3.00 at the Information Desk in Ellis. Tickets at the door will be $4.00. In the past, big name concerts at J.C. have presented the likes of John Denver, The Byrds, and last year, The Steve Miller Band.

A new kind of musical entertainment will be presented this year, according to Bader, in the form of mini-concerts starting with Canyon on September 30, and continuing throughout the year. The performers in these concerts will be emerging and talented musicians who have not yet reached the top.

Bruce's plans for "something different" include a series of meals which are not of the ordinary walk in, eat, walk out variety. For example, a Hobo Dinner, with the students dressed as tramps, might have newspaper tablecloths and coffee from a "recycled" bean can.

College Center Director Bader finds that the College Center is not everything that it might be in aesthetic terms. The building, he says, is too institutionalized and sterile. Hopefully, some changes can be made to give the building a more relaxed atmosphere because students can't afford to be uptight in those hours between books and studies.

Whitman First Topic in Lecture Series

by Richard Mettler

Professor William Hofelt spoke about "Whitman as the Seed Sower of the Universe" Thursday evening September 22 at Shoemaker Gallery. The main theme of the essays recited by Professor Hofelt dealt with the make-up of Walt Whitman not only as a poet but as an American romanticist.

"A romanticist is a new Eden of love and harmony which deals in political, moral, and metaphysical realms. When tyranny is put down love and beauty can spring into existence." These are but a few quotes used to show Whitman's role in American literature. As an American romanticist Whitman is a synthesis between Poe and Hawthorne and Thoreau and Emerson. He was a great believer in America and the common people and looked at them not merely as a politicle group but as cosmic awareness and realness.

Whitman's work has been called "great, inspired, insane."

Juniata College Views '72

by Henry Siedzikowski

It's a presidential election year again. The 18 year olds have the vote. Everybody is trying to stimulate political interest by the young. I am going to do my part in this mass stimulation in the best way I know how. I am going to give my views and then let them open for attack.

Since this is going to be a political editorial, it is obviously going to be biased in one direction or another. So, I would like to say right now that I am biased against Mr. Nixon. I am biased against because of the people who died at Kent State, at Jackson State, at Attica, at Soledad and because of those who are still dying needlessly in Vietnam. I believe my feelings were best expressed by Mr. Nixon himself in Santa Monica, California, on October 9, 1968. He said, "Those who have had a chance for four years and could not produce peace, should not be given another chance."

When one is attacking Mr. Nixon, the most difficult task is picking which of the ample places at which to start. I decided to start by answering a charge often thrown at Senator McGovern and then tossing the charge right back at Mr. Nixon.

The attack most often leveled at Senator McGovern is that he changes his views too often. The only area in which this may be justified is his economic policies. In the other issues, he may have elaborated a few details and modified a couple of others, however, his basic views have remained the same, and that can be documented. Speaking of details, when was the last time Mr. Nixon elaborated on his issues? America still doesn't know the details of his "secret plan" to end the war.

Now I'll take that charge the other way. One would expect that the President would be less changeable than a challenger. After all, it is one thing to be flexible when you're suggesting policies, and it's quite another when you're unstable making policies.

Has Mr. Nixon had a history of inconsistencies? He started his career as an anti-communist fighter, and now he feels himself the biggest supporter of better American relations with Communist countries. This is not to say that we should not try to improve our relations with Russia and China, but merely to point out the major change in Mr. Nixon's character.

However, you may say, that change has spanned a number of years. Men can learn and progress over the years. This is true, so allow me to point out a number of instances in the not so distant past.

When running for election in 1968, Mr. Nixon promised the country that there would be no wage and price freeze. Three years later we had a wage and price freeze. Then there was the situation with Pakistan and Bangladesh, when we could not decide who our support was really going to.

Some of the instances of Mr. Nixon's changes of mind are also clouded with some shady coincidences. One example came up a while back when Mr. Nixon was freezing milk prices. A short time after a campaign contribution from the dairymen, however, milk prices rose. Then just recently, it was discovered that there was a check to the Nixon campaign fund from a Minnesota businessman. This might not have been anything special, except for the fact that after making his contribution, he recieved a Federal bank charter in a remarkably short time.

Mr. Nixon's character is not the only thing that disturbs me. His ideas on several issues do not seem to be strictly in the best interests of many of the people of this country.

One aspect that should have special interest for students and other members of the campus community is Mr. Nixon's seeming indifference to education. When big city schools are crying for federal help to ease their financial burden and college students are asking for federal loans to help them get through, Mr. Nixon has steadfastly refused to approve funds that Congress has allocated. The situation has gotten so bad, that the NEA, a usually conserative group who do not endorse political candidates, have come out against Mr. Nixon.

Another aspect that should prove interesting is Mr. Nixon's seeming aversion to the advice of his experts. In 1969, the CIA and other intelligence agencies told Mr. Nixon that it would be practically worthless to mine the harbors of North Vietnam and conduct even a massive bombing strategy. Just last spring, Mr. Nixon chose to ignore this advice, and he started his big offensive. Almost six months later, the experts agree that the bombing and mining is doing very little practical damage, but Mr. Nixon is again choosing to ignore them and go on with his strategy.

What my case boils down to then, is a plea for those people who are still really in the middle, but leaning towards Mr. Nixon, to stop and remember. Remember the good like the trips to China and Russia, but also remember the other things. Remember Watergate and IT&T. Remember the Soviet wheat deal where windfall profits came to the big corporations because of poorly calculated subsidies, while the farmers who produced the wheat saw none of the profits. Remember the senseless bombings of North Vietnam, despite the fact that intelligence experts told Mr. Nixon that they were worthless. Remember how meat and food prices rose while wages remained the same. Remember the killings on college campuses and at the prisons. Remember the billions wasted in Vietnam, while people starved over here. Remember the indifferences to education. Remember the lack of blacks and women and young in Mr. Nixon's Cabinet or in top administrative posts, and remember how poor the prospects are for correction of this if Mr. Nixon is reelected. Remember the flood victims who did not get federal aid until Mr. Nixon turned it into a political football. Remember all these and maybe a few pet issues of your own. Maybe you would like to remember Mr. Agnew's attacks on the press or the way the Nixon administration handled the Pentagon Papers.

There is a lot of reflection to do here. Hopefully, a lot of people will be serious enough about voting to do the reflection. If enough people do, Mr. Nixon may be calling a press conference in a couple of months to make a similar announcment to the one he made about ten years ago. We won't have Richard Nixon to kick around anymore. It will take some of the fun out of life though.

Thoughts of a Frosh

by Dwight Johnson

As a child, I used to peek in dormitory windows and wonder what went on inside, now, after many years of uncertainty, I finally discovered what college is like. I came here apprehensive of what college life is all about, and confused by feeble attempts to understand the new program. Feeling quite little, lonely and helpless, while waiting for my dormitory key, a million ideas must have crossed my mind. None of them making sense, but all of them worthy of a new freshman. Then I, like the other freshmen, want to meet my roommate. Just one person, but in the next year, he would be the person most influential in my life style. After the formalities I looked around the campus, picked up what had to be picked up, and stared, confused at what I saw. It wasn't a big campus and I wasn't lost. I just wasn't adjusted to living with 1200 other people. Listening to the rumors and stories of the new schedule, I wondered if I was wasting my money here. After hearing the faculty's side of the program, I decided I wasn't. . Just a few thoughts from a freshman, yet universal among freshmen everywhere.

Faculty News

The staff of the Juniatian would like to take some time in this first issue to recognize some of the recent achievements by Juniata college faculty members.

Dr. Young W. Kihl, associate professor of political science at Juniata College, presented a paper at the International Symposium on the Problem of Korean Unification in Seoul, Korea. The meeting was held from August 17 to 19. Dr. Kihl attracted attention in his native country's major papers for his paper entitled, "Functional Approach to the South-North Reassociation." Dr. Kihl also attended the annual meeting of the American Political Science Association in Washington, D.C., along with Dr. Milton da Silva, assistant professor of political science.

Dr. Donald T. Hartman has had a paper accepted for the Eighth Inter-American Congress of Philosophy to be held in Brazil from October 30 to November 4. Dr. Hartman will not attend, but his paper will be presented at the Methodology of the Sciences section of the Congress.

SVS Organized; Starts Sept. 28

Student Volunteer Services, in the first stages of organization at Juniata, is a coordinating body whose primary purpose is to assist the people of the Huntingdon area. Sponsored by the Student Government, SVS will coordinate free student assistance with the various community service organizations that need and request it. At 7:30 Thursday, September 28, in Good Hall there will be a preliminary meeting of all students interested in donating any amount of time and effort, working such organizations.

Dr. Kihl Presents American Political Situation to Koreans

The following article was reprinted from the Korean Times. While Dr. Kihl was visiting Korea in late summer, he was asked to write the article explaining the effects of the American National Election on Kored:

Who will win in November 1972 is a matter of speculation and conjecture. From today's perspective, following the Democratic Party convention in Miami, Nixon seems more likely to win than McGovern does.

Whoever wins the coming election, the outcome is bound to influence the pattern and structure of political relationships not only in the United States but also in other countries, including Korea. The probable outcome as it affects the future of Korea can be assessed and speculated upon from the perspective of the national interest of Korea.

Nixon has built a formidable record on all fronts including foreign policy and economic growth. McGovern, on the other hand, seems to suffer from an image of a radical reformer. Yet, from Miami to November 1972 lies a long hot summer of political campaigning. In fact, the real electoral politics do not begin in earnest until after the Labor Day weekend in the U.S.

From now until then anything drastic or unexpected can happen. The war in Vietnam and the Paris peace talks, for instance, may not improve to favor Nixon. In that case the public opinion in the U.S. will side with McGovern's line of withdrawing the U.S. support of South Vietnam. Spiro Agnew's rhetoric on behalf of Nixon and Shriver's speech for McGovern will continue to excite and liven the atmosphere of the political landscape in the U.S.

Whatever the outcome of the election, the policy makers in Korea seem to possess little option except to wait and see. They might as well try to assess the probable impact which the U.S. presidential election will have on Korea.

In the short-term perspective Nixon's victory may favor Korea by perpetuating the current policy enunciated by the Nixon doctrine. The gradual troop withdrawal, coupled with the multi-billion dollar modernization of the Republic of Korea Armed Forces program, may be completed.

The immediate short-range benefit to Korea, however, must be carefully weighed against long-term considerations about the security of Korea. Nixon's victory, at best, means a posture of maintaining the status quo on the Korean peninsula.

In the long-term perspective, one can argue that a McGovern victory would be to the advantage of Korea for several reasons.

First McGovern has a better record of consistency in his position than Nixon does. Nixon has changed drastically from a staunch anti-Communist fighter in his early days to an advocate of accommodation with the Communist powers. His trips to Peking and Moscow are a testimony of this changing Nixon style. Of course one can argue that his trips are a display of courage and bold initiative. The point, though, is that Nixon is changeable and unpredictable.

McGovern, unlike Nixon has yet to demonstrate his administrative ability and skill, it is true. McGovern's record so far shows that his position is consistent and reliable so far as his main policy outline is concerned.

A second reason, more important from the perspective of the national interest of Korea, is that the Democratic Party is more willing and likely to honor its commitment in Korea. The record shows that it was the Democratic Party which came out in support of the Republic of Korea in June 1950 and the Republican Party which terminated the combat in Korea in 1953. Thus, from the security perspective, it is the Democratic Party, not the Republican Party, which may benefit the Republic of Korea in the years ahead.

Of course, there is no guarantee, given the present anti-war mood in the U.S., that a Democratic administration under McGovern will once again decide to commit ground troops in Asia. One can still argue, though, that the situation in Korea will present a different picture to the American public if hostilities break out on the Korean peninsula because of the invasion of the south by north Korea.

The generation which participated in the Korean conflict early in 1950 is now fully in command as key leaders in all walks of life in the U.S. Many of them still cherish a memory of Korea, a noble cause of protecting a helpless victim in the cold war days.

It is said that nations have no permanent friends or enemies, but only permanent interests. If the above cliche has any validity at all in the affairs of states I think the Republic of Korea should reorient its posture and attitude toward the great powers including the U.S. as an ally.

Instead of relying on an external power it is about time for Korea to become self-reliant in international relations. The destiny of Korea must not be decided by an external force.

When this position is recognized it should not matter really whether Nixon or McGovern wins the November 1972 election in the U.S. The policy makers of Korea might as well continue to improve its national strength and capability through its bold domestic programs of economic development, rural assistance, etc. If so, the status of Korea, sooner or later, will be recognized and respected by her neighbors — friends and foes alike.

Tests Administered To Future Teachers

EDUCATIONAL TESTING SERVICE, PRINCETON, NEW JERSEY, September 11. College seniors preparing to teach school may take the National Teacher Examinations on any of the four different test dates announced today by Educational Testing Service, a nonprofit, educational organization which prepares and administers this testing program.

New dates for the testing of prospective teachers are: November 11, 1972, and January 27, April 7, and July 21, 1973. The tests will be given at nearly 500 locations throughout the United States, ETS said.

Results of the National Teacher Examinations are used by many large school districts as one of several factors in the selection of new teachers and by several states for certification or licensing of teachers. Some colleges also require all seniors preparing to teach to take the examinations. The school systems and state departments of education which use the examination results are listed in an NTE leaflet entitled Score Users which may be obtained by writing to ETS.

On each full day of testing, prospective teachers may take the Common Examinations which measure their professional preparation and general educational background and a Teaching Area Examination which measures their mastery of the subject they expect to teach.

Prospective teachers should contact the school systems in which they seek employment, or their colleges, for specific advice on which examinations to take and on which dates they should be taken.

The Bulletin of Information for Candidates contains a list of test centers, and information about the examinations, as well as a Registration Form. Copies may be obtained from college placement officers, school personnel departments, or directly from National Teacher Examinations, Box 911, Educational Testing Service, Princeton, New Jersey 08540.

THE BIG HOUSE

by Richard Mettler

"There was me, that is Alex, and my three droogs, that is Pete, Georgie, and Dim, Dim being really dim, and we sat in the Korova Milkbar making up our rossoodocks what to do with the evening," That is how Malcolm McDowell began his opening monologue in Stanley Kubrick's masterpiece based on the book by Anthony Burgess.

"A Clockwork Orange" is an inexhaustable source of thought. After seeing the film four times myself I still have not rendered from it all that I can. A viewer of this film must constantly be aware of not only the obvious but the minutest details as well to fully appreciate the genius of Stanley Kubrick.

Malcolm McDowell was magnificent in the film as were his confreres. After seeing McDowell's performance in "If" Kubrick decided that no one else could possibly play the part of Alex. In fact Kubrick said, "If it wasn't for Malcolm McDowedd there would be no 'A Clockwork Orange.'"

"Clockwork" in the film symbolizes technology which is in constant struggle with "orange", symbolic with nature. Man is the most infinitesimal part of the total macrocosm. He alone is pathetically helpless against an environment that has chosen perversion and violence as a way. He is manacled to this type of existence and must either conform or perish. Only when he has accepted the world for what it is can he function from within. There is no functioning from without.

The music of Henry Purcell, Gioachino Rossini, Walter Carlos, and Sir Edward Elgar play an instrumental role in the mood and ueaning of the film. And of course, Gene Kelly's Singing in the Rain affords a finale that would fail to move no one. But it's the second and fourth movements of Ludwig van Beethoven's Ninth Symphony that have the greatest affect on the rood of the film. Perhaps the most gripping part of the film takes place during the second movement, called Suicide Scherzo, towards the end of the drama. Beethoven the man is as dominentrac recurring theme as his music.

You don't just view "A Clockwork Orange", you become part of it.

Indians Destroy Aggie Defense In Opening Game of Football Season

by Tony Martuzas

The Juniata Offense, dormant throughout the 1971 football season, displayed sparks of life, but the sparks faded out in the second half. . The Blue and Gold easily handed arch-rival Delaware Valley a 24-14 defeat. The quarterback spot has definitely improved, the ball carriers are better than ever, and the line is now forming into a solid front. Graduation losses seem to have had a negligible effect on this year's team.

Early in the first quarter, JC quarterback Gary Shope, rolling out to his right, connected with tight end Karl Bergstresser for a 47 yard gain, spotting the ball on the Aggie nine-yard line. Mike McNeal went twisting and turning through the middle for a gain of four yards. Shope, on the option play, rolled left and abruptly dove into the endzone for six. McNeal's kick was good.

The Aggies returned the ensuing kick to their own 24 and their quarterback Jim Foote (decisive figure in the Aggie's 21-14 victory over the Indians in last year's meeting) proceeded to go to work. With a seven point lead to protect, the Indian Defense began hitting and did they hit! After halfback Richie Glenn and fullback Floyd Alderfer tried to advance the ball, quarterback Foote was forced to set up in a hurry and he let loose a wobbling pass right into the waiting hands of Indian defensive back Dee Adcock.

The Indian Offense took over on their own 37 yard line. Immediately Carmen DeFrancesco, Lou Eckerl, and Mike McNeal came charging through the Aggie defensive line. On the Aggie six-yard line, Shope, rolling to his right, spun around and hit Mike Reiter cutting across the endzone. McNeal's kick was on Juniata 14, Delaware Valley 0.

Later in the second quarter, being aided by a questionable pass interference call, fullback Bill Harris slipped in for six. Steve Bailey's kick knotted the score at seven-all.

Early in the third quarter, Bill Harris scored his second touchdown by leaping into the endzone (the kick failed). Greg Kennedy returned the Denison kickoff to the Indian 23 yard line. On the very first play, the ball was jarred loose and the Big Red recovered. Denison took advantage of the generous Juniata offering by scoring in two plays. It was at this point where the Big Red turned the hard fought game into a rout.

The Indians again took a toll in injuries; linebacker Waggoner's ankles swelled and tackle Steve Oak was clipped from behind after the run out of bounds. The officials seemed to have missed that call, along with many others.

Even though they were defeated, the Indians are still contenders in the MAC, it's just a matter of staying healthy.

Later in the second quarter, with about four minutes remaining in the half, the Indians began a drive from their own twenty. Six plays later, Shope flipped a pass to McNeal and then he romped 48 yards to the Del Val 4 yard-line, but a penalty was called for an ineligible receiver downfield. From that point it looked like a repeat of last year's games; Juniata would gain good ground only to have it called back because of a penalty. Anyway, after Greg Kennedy picked up seven yards, McNeal, in almost a mirror play of last time, gathered in a short pass from Shope and galloped 46 yards to the Aggie 14 yard-line. Lou Eckerl capped the drive by banging into the endzone for the score. Juniata 21, Delaware Valley 0.

In the third quarter, the Indian Offensive Machinery grounded to a complete halt, due to three fumbles. The Aggie Offense, listless during the first half, could still not produce a touchdown with the turnover, the stiff Indian Defense simply wouldn't allow it. However, with the second fumble, the Aggies obliged the generous Indian blunder by scoring. Later in the fourth, the Aggies managed to score again, but a McNeal 34 yard field goal iced the cake by putting the game out of Delaware Valley's reach.

The Indians finally have a potent offense. They could have scored 40 points but due to their poor showing in the 3rd Quarter, the offense only mustered a field goal. The Indian Defense is as firm as last year's, only playing the entire 3rd period hindered their performance.

Tom Herrman (33) zeroes in on Richard Glenn of Delaware Valley after a pass reception.

Indians Still In MAC After Defeat

Last Saturday the Indians traveled to Granville Ohio where they took on the Big Red of Denison University. The Indians played an outstanding first half, but crumbled in the second.

The Indians got on the scoreboard first as Lary Cerny crunched Big Red quarterback Greg Ellis, causing him to fumble (Dee Adcock recovered for the Indians). Lou Eckerl went bulldozing through the Big Red line while Mike McNeal was sweeping the corners. On the Denison 12 yard line, Greg Kennedy swept right end for the score.

Center Bd. Plans Exciting Year

by Fredi Zwirner

Even though Juniata's Center Board is a rather unknown organization on campus, the group plays an important role in the college's activity schedule. The Center Board is headed by Bruce Bader who was appointed this summer with Frank Pote being student chairman. Dr. Erick Erickson is the faculty representative and we are in the process of appointing a new alumni representative to replace John Loose who just recently resigned. Jack Carton is the Student Government representative. There are four divisions of Center Board each having its own chairman—Social Activities with Del Newquist heading a committee of five; Special Events with Fredi Zwirner; Fine Arts with Judy Rosen and Dave McDowell working together; and Sports and Games with Jim Daniels heading this division. The Board meets weekly and plans all campus activities for the year including dances, concerts, plays, sports events, "big weekends" like Homecoming, lectures, coffeehouses and movies. It is difficult to plan activities to please everyone within our budget so we are always open for suggestions. Anyone with ideas please contact any of the above chairmen or stop by the information desk in Ellis.

Fourteen Intramural Tournies Scheduled

by Vernre L. Wetzel

Have you noticed something new this year? I'm referring to intramural athletics. Someone seems to be doing a tremendous job on the administrative side for getting things organized this year. Would you believe there are 14 different intramural tournaments scheduled for this year? These include activities for men, women, and also co-recreational opportunities. Many of the old favorites are back, bigger and better, and a number of new ones are here—like tennis, badminton, softball, and track—all on the intramural basis. There is even the possibility to introduce your own favorite sport into the intramural program, if by chance it is missing. That seems to be quite an offer by the athletic department.

Mr. Dean M. Rossi, Director of Intramurals and his staff are probing the possibilities of a faculty intramural league and a faculty-student league. The student leagues for the fall activities are already set up—there are men's touch football, soccer, and tennis singles; then there are women's powderpuff football, field hockey (interscholastic), and tennis singles; and finally for the fall there is co-recreational tennis doubles.

The next tournaments will be basketball—men's and women's intramural, and the entries open October 30. If you want something to do to relax or maybe even to get into shape or for what ever your motivation, intramurals is the thing to get into. There is something in it for everyone. Some of the fall tournaments were hampered by few entries. The key to the success of any part of the intramural program is in the hands of those who would participate. That's you. With ten more tournaments left for this year(and the first four have only begun!) there is lots yet to do and to enjoy. It's nice to have something to be able to grasp, something all there just waiting. If you don't try it, you will be the one who misses the fun.

A few scores have come in already. One women's powderpuff game was played last Thursday. The score was Tussy Tigers (East Houses) 0 — Amazons 0. The Tigers were awarded the win on the basis of more first downs gained, which were three. There are two games scheduled for this week. In men's touch football, the standings are:

Ant Hill Mob	1	0
Northeast Brewers	0	1
Northwest Wombats	0	1

As of September 22, Pat White of the Moose Platoon led the league scoring with three touchdowns.

The tennis ladder tournament matches are played at times agreed on by the contestants. Two matches per week are required, so there will be scores next week. Look for intramural news each week for the scores and standings.

JC Drops Meet To Saint Francis

by Bill Robison

On Wednesday, September 20, in their opening meet of the 1972 season, the Juniata College Cross Country runners gave a commendable performance despite a 22-34 lost to Saint Francis College. On the hilly College Golf Course at Loretto, Pa., the Juniata runners made their way over a maze of paths and hills on a 4.9 mile course.

Actually the meet was much closer than the score would indicate in that only a minute and one half separated the first and last place runners.

The top performance for Saint Francis was by freshman Rich Redmond who was clocked at 26:12. Surprisingly, Juniata's first finisher was freshman Jack McCullough from Willow Grove, Pa. who was timed at 26:24, good enough for second place. Rounding out the top five finishers for Juniata were; Brian Maurer (4th), Doug Crosby (8th), Jim Bowen (9th) and Bill Kibler (11th).

Despite the opening loss, it should be known that this was Juniata's opening meet while Saint Francis recorded their second victory in their fourth meet of the year. Revenge may take place on November 1 when Saint Francis runs against the Juniata harriers on their own stomping grounds.

Mrs. Blaisdell Takes Position in Beeghly Library

Amid the hushed whispers and rustling of papers in Beeghley Library, one can now hear the musical French accent of Mrs. Denise Blaisdell, Juniata's newly acquired reference librarian. The wife of Prof. Blaisdell of Juniata, our new reference librarian is a native of Brussels, Belgium, and has obtained her B.A. from Juniata and her M.A. from San Jose University. Mrs. Blaisdell is "very anxious to meet students" and wants to know "exactly what they want their library to give them."

Ambitious Frosh Senators Take New Positions in Student Gov't

by Cindy Szczerba

By this time, most freshman are familiar with the names Elaine Becker, Steve Cordova, Cindy Schwarzfisher and Sam Sirianni. These people are the newly elected Senators who will be representing the freshman class. Now that they are the official representatives of the freshman class, what do these Senators have to say about their new positions?

Elaine Becker of York, Pa. considers it an honor to be chosen and promises to represent her class to the best of her ability. Elaine's committee—Budget & Management will involve her in the distribution of Student Government money to various campus organizations.

The other female Senator with the thirteen-letter name, Cindy Schwarzfisher of Altoona, Pa. is excited to be elected Freshman Senator. She believes one must take his duties as they come and the main obligation right now is the drive for the student vote. Her committee is the Student Concerns dealing with the drinking age, abortion referral service, getting the pill on campus and general problems of the student.

Another Altoonian is Steve Cordova. One of the few black students on the J.C. campus, Steve finds his new position a real challenge. He says that a lot of students don't really care about their class. These bumps-on-a-log pass the buck to those Student Government people who supposedly have time to solve problems.

Steve wants to go out and get these people involved with student life as well as students who have problems, but don't openly express their gropes. Steve will be spending a lot of his time with his committee, Residential Living.

Knowing Cindy as an old time classmate in Altoona, Steve feels they will really be able to work together well. In fact, both expressed their desire to start right away working together in their new positions.

The final elected member is Sam Sirianni from Long Branch, New Jersey. Like Cindy he is also on the Student Concerns Committee and his main concern now is to get the J.C. students to vote. He expressed his reason for choosing Juniata — he wanted to attend a small college and he's finding that everyone is friendly and helpful. The others also expressed that other J.C. students make them feel welcome.

Now you have a picture of how these people stand on Student Government issues. Their duty is to provide advice and help to fellow students, so make it a point to meet the Freshman Senators.

Staff And Students Grieve At Faculty Member's Death

by Patrick Minnick

Professor of biology, Dr. John R. Comerford, Sr., a leading member of the Juniata faculty, passed away on Tuesday, September 26 at the Hershey Medical Center. He was chairman of the biology department between the years of 1962 and 1969. Comerford, a '50 graduate of Juniata and Ph.D. at Georgetown University in '57, was respected among biologists and a member of many organizations in his field.

Dr. Comerford had been in poor health a week prior to his death, suffering from progressive heart failure and pneumonia. A member of the Stone Church of the Brethren, he is survived by his mother, Mrs. Naomi Evans Comerford; his wife Doris Eichelberger Comerford, and his children. His father was the late Bert M. Comerford.

The burial took place at Grandview Cemetery in Altoona with the Rev. Andrew Murray, campus minister, leading the services. Dr. Comerford asked that memorial contributions be made to Juniata in lieu of flowers.

Class Meetings Begin School Year

by Henry Siedzikowski

With the beginning of the new school year, the classes were having meetings to decide their courses of action for the year. Most of the business centered around the floats for Homecoming and the budgets for the coming year.

The class-sponsered Homecoming floats are an attempt to revive a tradition which was supposedly killed last year. However, there was a lot of support for bringing them back, and so this year will be something of a trial to see if the classes and the students really want them. Each class was informed that they will receive twenty-five dollars to help defray the costs of the floats. The major problem, however, is getting enough interested people to work on them.

Homecoming Weekend Slated as Electrifying

by Sue Blum

Homecoming? What's that? Well it's only the biggest fall weekend on the Juniata campus. Starting off with the Freshman Bonfire on the eve of Friday the thirteenth there will be refreshments provided from the food service and the coaches and players will speak. Saturday morning there will be such exciting things as a parade and floats. Our Juniata Indians will be playing against Westminster College. Come and watch us win! At halftime you can settle down to a big show. There will be the crowning of the queen, the parade of floats and a performance by a highschool band around the field. And that's not all folks! At 2:15 our Cross country team will meet Johnstown Pitt with more halftime entertainment. After the game there will be a President's Reception on the house lawn of 415 18th Street. Come and rap informally with a teacher. Now down to the big stuff. On Saturday evening Mudshark and Seatrain, a six man country rock band, can be seen in concert for the cheap price of only $3 in advance and $4 at the door. Following that, Sunday evening at 8:00 there will be a miniconcert with the SSinful Street Two, which will be located in Oller Hall. How's that grab you? "Super Man!" "Just Unbelievable!"

Name Change Considered

by Henry Siedzikowski

One of the controversies which arose last year concerned the changing of Juniata's nickname. At a time when a lot of colleges, who used the Indian as their mascot, were discovering a social conscience and condemning the use of this nickname, Juniata finally decided to come to grips with the issue.

However, the issue managed to hide itself during the remainder of last year. It was constantly clouded with questions and arguments such as whether the Indian in the library would have to be destroyed.

For the people who are still interested, the issue is still alive. There is a committee which is studying the problem and a solution should be forthcoming sometime during this year.

Big Happenings At JC Tonight

On Wednesday night, October 4, the Juniata Campus will be overflowing with activity. There will be a little something for everyone.

For those who get into college activities, there will be club meetings, such as the Barristers Club meeting at 7:00. For those who have some feeling about the food service, there will be a food service committee meeting.

It will also be a field day, or night actually, for those who are into the political scene. Alumni Hall will be the forum for two movies and a speaker. The speaker will be Earl P. Collins, Democratic candidate for the Congress of the United States from the Ninth Congressional District.

The two movies are "Interviews With Veterans of My Lai" and "Milhouse". "Interviews" will have no admission, while "Milhouse" will cost fifty cents. All in all, it should be an exciting evening.

"Civilization" Series Covers Careers of Leading Artists

Juniata College students and faculty who enjoyed the Kenneth Clark "Civilisation" series of films last year will have another opportunity to sample Lord Clark's erudition and wit when a six-part film series on the "Pioneers of Modern Painting" is screened in Alumni Hall beginning Tuesday, October 10, at 8:00 p.m.

Juniata College will receive the six "Pioneers of Modern Art" films on loan, free of charge, from the National Gallery of Art in Washington under a program offered through the Gallery's Extension Service. The distribution of the series has been made possible by a grant from the National Endowment for the Humanities.

Sponsored by President John N. Stauffer, the films are also being screened for the public in the Middle School Auditorium with the cooperation of the Huntingdon Art League and its chairman, Dr. Howard Crouch. Except for the first film all Juniata College screenings will be held on Monday evening and at the Middle School on Tuesday evening. Both places are open to the public free of charge.

The new series covers the life and works of six leading artists of the late 19th and early 20th centuries: Edouard Manet, Paul Cezanne, Claude Monet, Georges Seurat, Henri Rousseau, and Edward Munch. A 45 minute color film has been devoted to each of the artists whom Lord Clark considers to be "the pioneers of what we still call modern painting."

Most of the series was filmed in France, with the exception of Edvard Munch which was photographed in Norway, the artist's native country. Lord Clark has not relied solely, however, on the paintings found in the artists' own country. For instance, 13 of the works are hanging in the National Gallery of Art in Washington.

The dates for the films are as follows:

Edouard Manet, October 10; Paul Cezanne, October 16; Claude Monet, October 23; Georges Seurat, October 30. And in November, Henri Rousseau on November 6 and Edvard Munch, November 13.

Study Abroad - Something For Everyone To Think Over

by John Mitchell

"Who me?", you ask when proposed with the idea of studying abroad. Certainly it is possible to study abroad, and one of the possibilities exists right here at Juniata, known as the Brethren Colleges Abroad (BCA) program. The program, which began in 1962, is a cooperative undertaking of six liberal arts colleges throughout the U.S. Some of the highlights of the program include enrichment through travel, independent study in a foreign country, becoming oriented to other cultures and civilizations of contempory countries, and the complete self-satisfaction of fluently learning a foreign language. However, it should be immediately and strongly emphasized that one must NOT be a language major in order to make use of this spectacular opportunity.

At this point there may be questions which have arisen concerning the costs of the program, eligibility in the program, the educational facilities and course offerings, the academic program and calendar, receiving of credits and the transfer of these credits, room and board, personal expenses, leisure time, etc. Therefore, the college has established the "Ad Hoc Committee on Study Abroad" with Dr. Irene M. Engle as the Foreign Studies Coordinator. Other people who have been appointed by the Provost to the committee include, Professor George Dolnikowski — Office 425 Founders, Mrs. Marie-Jose Fassiotto — Office 3rd Fl. Founders, Ms. Jeanne Elliott — Box 1706, Ms. Karen Jones and Mr. John Mitchell — office hour in Founders 400, the Foreign Studies Office, on Tuesday from 1:30 - 2:30.

One of the functions of the committee is to serve as counseling body for students interested in studying abroad. Language majors should speak first with a faculty member in the Language Department. Students who have decided to study under the Brethren College Abroad Program at Marburg, West Germany; Strasbourg, France or Barcelona, Spain should see the B. C. A. Coordinator, Professor Dolnikowski, for further information and application materials. Persons wishing to study in France but who have not definitely decided on the B. C. A. Program there, should see Mrs. Fassiotto. Any others can see any of the above named committee personnel for any questions that arise. The committee has a modest library of materials describing various foreign study programs. Interested students are encouraged to come and browse through the materials in Founders 400. An attempt will be made to provide the Division I secretary with a key to that office which is to be made available to students wishing access to F. 400 at times when no committee member is in attendance. We certainly hope to see many students at our office in the very near future.

Class Meetings Held

The freshmen class held its meeting without any officers to direct them because they are now in the process of electing their steering committee. The meeting was held, however, to meet their advisor, who is Dana Ono, and their candidates for the Student Senate.

The classes this year will not only enter floats, but also work on special projects, such as sponsoring dances. And of course the main effort of the class will be directed towards winning the competition when All Class Night comes around in the spring.

Lime

by Edward Kinchley Evans

I think we've thrown out the nekkid baby with the tepid bath water. Here we have a freshly laundered new Concert Series and a spanking new year to dress it and us up with and the first show cancelled. We are off to a galloping halt!

What is particularly distressing is that it was to be a performance of a play called "Company", which was the Establishment's spin off of "Hair". You might think of it as a theatrical child sired by a gift of Neil Simon as the donor and Totie Fields as the mother incubator. That sort of bastard in the Old English sense of the word. But it was a play and first produced at least in this Century.

I spent the major part of my summer at Dr. Todd's having my fangs scissored up for the occasion . . . and you wanna know what they did?

In an old routine by Phylis Diller where she is commenting on the ungodly filth in the particular cellar where she is working and it is alive with cock roaches, so much so the Health Department has threatened to shutter it, she queries the audience about the owner's reaction to the problem, "You know what they did? They hired a Spanish dancer!" Then she'd go into her wild cackle and do a quick little roach stamping routine.

Well, that's it. They replaced "Company" with a Spanish dancer. And not even Escudero. . .and don't spit on the shoes to shine them. . .and a whole bag of unhappy thoughts about mixed metaphors, emotions, and cold turkey.

You can lead us to the Culture Trough but you gotta be carefull about whose minding the slops. You can't cry poverty on one hand and with the other serve up 18th Century delicacies on a gold plate. Last year we had all sorts of nourishing left-overs; an old roast by Eugene O'Neill, an Aunt Jemima boxed Shakespeare mix, an unjellied consomme by the ever popular Pennsylvania Ballet, and all that heavily laced with strong Irish coffee.

When in the name of all that secures our senses are we going to be served a generous helping of "nowness"? I feel like we're all caught in a Kalos Clifton movie. . two years and twenty centuries out of touch with the rest of the world.

We have in our scholastic heavens the brilliant Hirsch constellation who gave us the gothic horror of Menotti's "The Medium". But that is already dust gathering.

At Gettysburg two years ago the students and faculty gave one of the first American performances of "Jesus Christ Superstar" and the response was chilling in the desperate struggle of starved human beings trying to get near enough to see and hear something with a little meat still clinging to its emotional bones.

When our students minds and bodies are nervously in suspension as they scan the horizon of the future as they wait for the box cars of conformity they are to be herded into, we offer them the solace of a string quartet playing Chopin.

It's not that I'm too bright or my taste above that of the multi-million dollar spectacular. . . . . but I do like some of my theatre straight to the gut and preferably without music.

THE BIG HOUSE

by Richard Mettler

The setting was Berlin. The time was 1931. Except for the Jewish population the people were happy, free, and uninhibited. It was a time when the beer was cheap, the girls were free, and laughter came easy. But this Utopian existence was not to last. A dark spectre was hovering over the heads of the sheep soon to be led to slaughter.

In "Cabaret" Liza Minneli got her first big opportunity for the cinema. She did not bungle the opportunity. Portraying a confused, promiscuous, burlesque-type singer aspiring to be an actress she opens the way to unique plot interpretation. She and Joel Grey as the "Emcee", who is receiving no slight acclaim for his work in "George M.", manage to relate on stage the total mood and plot of the real drama out on the streets. Michael York and Helmut Greim also do commendable performances. But director Bob Fosse should be given special acknowledgement for it was his ability to relate the critical action through the symbolism on the Cabaret stage to make the film as potent as it is. The success of the film is definitely built around the co-operative efforts of Liza Minneli, Joel Grey, and Bob Fosse.

In spite of the apparent general good feeling in Germany there was considerable apprehension and confusion. The Jewish people were being severly descriminated against for it seemed as though they were all wealthy merchants and bank owners. Actually those Jews who were wealthy had their wealth thrust upon them by the very anti-Semitic people who persecuted them. Before the German stock market crash the Jews weren't allowed to invest their money into stocks. So after the crash the Jews had all of their money in their homes, thus leaving them to control big business in Germany. There also was a fear of the Communists who the German people neatly tied in with the Jewish population. To the average unsuspecting German citizen the Nazi movement was, to para-phrase Helmut Greim, "A bunch of hooligans who serve one specific purpose, to get rid of the Jews and the Communists. After that we just take their power away".

The profound decadence and naivety of the German population paved the way for Adolf Hitler and the "Siegfried Follies." Nazism literally sneaked into Germany.

In the beginning of the film we see a young Nazi soldier asking for contributions for the party. He is very quickly and ungraciously ushered out by the owner of the Kit Cat Club. From this we see the initial rejection very rapidly wears off.

Through the rest of the film we see the party coming into power within Germany. The people become frightened and confused as they are surrounded by various beatings and mysterious missing families. There are also corner stands offering Nazi literature and blonde haired, blue eyed male adonises singing songs of the Fatherland throughout German beer gardens.

"Cabaret" is an excellant film for it shows something happening as it really happened. It's a beautiful film because it is truth. Due to apathy and ignorance the whole world shuddered under the threat of fascist intolerance. It is not a pleasing story in the sense of happiness. But it is a very necessary story and one that needs to be told again and again lest the world forget what almost happened.

NEA To Endorse McGovern—Shriver

The Executive Committee of the nation's largest individual-member association of college students, the Student National Education Association, today endorsed Sen. George McGovern for the presidency, noting that his record "shows his commitment to our country's youths and their concerns." This was the first time the organization, which this year is composed largely of new voters, has backed a presidential candidate.

Thomas D. Creighton, president of the 80,000-member organization, announced the endorsement of the McGovern-Shriver ticket by the Student NEA's 12-member Executive Committee at a news conference in the Statler-Hilton Hotel. At the same time, the 22-year-old youth leader from Lincoln, Nebr., declared that "we are appalled at the record of Richard Nixon during his first 40 months in the White House."

Creighton, a 1972 graduate of Nebraska Wesleyan University, asserted that the 12 million new voters produced by the recent eighteen-year-old vote legislation "can and will determine who resides in the White House for the next four years." He called on members of his association on more than 1,000 college and university campuses to back McGovern.

The leader of the Student NEA, which is affiliated with the 1.2 million-member National Education Association, lauded McGovern for having "often stood alone in his battles to represent our viewpoints."

"George McGovern was the first man to speak out publicly in the United States Senate against the Vietnam war and its atrocities," Creighton said. "He was one of the first candidates to honestly listen to what youths were saying and was the leader in efforts to involve all of America's interests in the political process."

The young Nebraskan noted that McGovern had championed effective youth participation in the Democratic National Concention and other political decision-making bodies. He added that McGovern "helped open the doors for our entry into the great American political arena." He said the South Dakotan is "the only candidate in the presidential election whose voting record on education, health, and welfare reflects his commitment to protecting our rights and our dignity."

Creighton blasted the Nixon Administration, declaring that the President has given indications that the rights and concerns of young people "are unimportant compared to the demands of the

New Telephone System Discussed

Juniata's Student Government is investigating the posibility of some form of intercampus phones. Dave Baer and Dean Gabriel are contacting other small colleges to inquire about their phone systems. One suggestion would be to install one phone on each dorm floor that could be used only for intercampus calls. The major problem with the entire idea seems to be — that one dilemma we can never get away from — not enough MONEY!

Introspection By JC Student

by Chris McFarland

Sometime after the Fall semester was over last year, about three or four hours I think, I left Juniata College on a leave of absence. I had told the administration I needed a change from the academic atmosphere, but the truth was I just wasn't getting any lasting satisfaction from any of the routine here at Juniata College. Let's talk about what the routine is here at Juniata College: 1. Studies: classes, labs, all nighters for the tests and papers, to hit some of the major worries. 2. The tension relievers: sports, sex, and alcohol, and then drugs, if the others are not enough. Oh, I almost forgot the stereo competitions and all the other little games that seem to be so esoteric to the college student. Please don't think I'm talking with a superior attitude because I know that I'm no better than anyone else, and more than that, I have participated actively in most of these activities for the wrong reasons, though I hate to admit it.

As I was saying, I left. I didn't know why then, but I understand perfectly now. Call it serendipity because I went looking for myself and found God, or rather he found me. Now I'm back again at Juniata, but only because God wants me here. It seems really strange to be writing this article because I don't know if there is anyone who really cares. But let's put it on these terms — if you don't know what God has said about how we are to get into a proper, a dynamic, and a personal relationship with God then I would suggest that you go and find out. Take it from someone who has sung his guts out in your choir for the wrong reasons, who has overacted in your plays for the wrong reasons, and who has done most of the other things that the typical J.C. student does also for the wrong reasons; there is something better.

Intramural Program Off to Great Start

by Vernne L. Wetzel

The intramural program is now in full swing. The office has received pages of game scores, team standings, and league leading scorers. The intramural office is really on its toes this year.

In soccer, on Monday, September 25, Runamuck defeated Mob Squab 2-1. The scorers for Runamuck were Paul Donahue and Karl Koval, and for Mob Squab Tom Alessi scored one goal. Huntingdon United is the other team in the league. In 6 man soccer, on Tuesday, the 26th., Kings High dumped Hot Gazees 5-0. The scorers for Kings were Paul Donahue 2, Keith Willis 1, and Steve Dunkle 2. On Thursday, the 28th., Kings High defeated The Cripples 3-2, Steve Dunkle, Jeff Culler, and Brad Glassmoyer each scoring one goal for the Kings, and Bob Pritchard and Sam Livengood scoring one each for The Cripples. The standings at the end of last week were

In men's touch football, last Monday Dubois House defeated Ratzass 27-2. Ron Tomcavage scored 3 TD's and Knealey scored one TD for Dubois. Mike Buckwalter and Keith Klein added conversions for Dubois. The Marfils won by a Weathermen forfeit. On Tuesday, the 26th., the scores of games scheduled were Weathermen 12 — Northeast Brewers 0 and Moose Platoon 31 — Jonsey and the Boys 0. In the first game, Toby Jennings and Bob Barth each scored a TD for the Weathermen. In the second game, Pat White scored 2 TD's, Jeff Laudenslager scored 2 TD's and a conversion, and Ed Richards scored one TD. On Wednesday, the 27th., all scheduled football and soccer games were postponed due to weather conditions. The games will be rescheduled for the last week in October; team captains will be notified. On Thursday, the 28th., the Ant Hill Mob beat the Weathermen 13-0, and Ratzass defeated Jonsey et. al. 20-0.

Lenny Brooks scored 1 TD and Steve Weber scored a conversion for Ant Hill Mob (the other 6 points have not been credited to a specific player). For Ratzass, Walt Prozialeck, Dave Shoner, and T. Sheridan each scored a TD, and Milt Knause added 2 conversions. The standings at the end of the week were

Ratzass	1	1	0
Weathermen	1	2	0

The league's leading scorer as of Friday was Pat White with 30 points scored on 5 TD's.

The powderpuff season began Thursday, September 21 when the Tussy Tigers defeated the Amazons. On Tuesday, the 26th., the J.A.'s defeated the Abecidarians 2-0 on a safety by Jean Griffith. On Thursday, the 28th., the Abecidarians defeated H. &. H., Inc. 12-0 on two TD's by Cathy Dickey, who leads the league scoring with 2 TD's for a total of 14 points. The standings at the end of the week were

In ladder I, men's singles tennis, last week Eric Keisshauer defeated Alan Kulp; and Dave Miller first defeated Bob Orr and then Bill Seibert to reach the top of that ladder. In ladders II and III, men's singles, no changes were made, and none were made in women's singles ladder IV, men's doubles ladder VI, or the varsity ladder VII. In ladder V, co-rec. doubles, Jim Combs and Jan Ferry defeated George Magruder and Sharon Chilcote to take the top of the ladder. Dave Harrison and Vernne Wetzel defeated Jeff Scott and Nancy Eisenbeis to take 5th. position.

As mentioned earlier, the games last Wednesday were rained out. All intramural games will be played unless severe weather conditions are in effect at game time. The women's field hockey practice for last Wednesday was also rained out, but even before that on Tuesday, the 26th., a meeting of girls interested in hockey was attended by only 7 people. Even considering the freshman movie schedule, that was poor. At this time 4 games are tentatively scheduled with schools in the area. If more interest and participation is shown, there is a strong possibility of developing a full inter-scholastic collegiate schedule. There will be a practice tonight at 6:00 on the field behind Ellis. If it rains, there will be a brief practice in the gym. Right now there are barely enough girls to form a team. If any girls are interested, come tonight. We need your support.

Brian Maurer breaks the tape at Saturday's meet with Albright. The Indians won the meet 22-31.

Indians Humbled By Lions in Third Game

by Tony Martuzas

Last Saturday was a bit unusual; the temperature dipped down to the 50's, WJC was stuck on top of the Press Box roof (fully exposed to the elements and the thunderous P.A. System), one young man broke the school's record for the 220 yard dash in bare feet, and the Albright Lions came to Huntingdon. The Lions just happened to show up for the Indians worst performance of the year.

Early in the first quarter, with third and two yards to go for the first down, Lion running back Al Patane took quarterback's Rou Curnow's handoff and raced around left end 42 yards for the score. On Albright's next series, fullback-kicker Jim Kuhn kicked a 40 yard field goal to put the Lions ahead, 10-0.

The Indians could not put one good drive together. Maybe it was due to Albright's excellent coverage on the secondary (Ben McCormick, Tom Zielinski, Don McNeal, and Scott Simpson). Another problem was pass protection, as Indian quarterback Gary Shope would look downfield, he'd find his receiver's covered and all of a sudden Albright Middle Guard Carl Fischl (or his friends) would bury Shope. Another problem may have been inconsistency. Each play, one Indian player would miss his block or assignment, rendering the entire play useless. Pardon the cliche, but it was one of those days.

To cap off the disappointing day, Roy Curnow who connected with his split-end Robin Hynicka for a 29 yard touchdown pass. Kuhn's kick made it 17-0, and that's how the game ended.

There's not much more to add (except that I forgot to mention Joe Coradetti's three interceptions against Denison U.), but the Indians now have six more chances to better their 1-1 (1-2 over-all) record. The Indians will be meeting Susquehanna on their grounds.

Exciting Game This Sat. At Susquehanna

by Bill Robison

In an interview at halftime of the Albright vs. Juniata football game this past Saturday, I met Mr. Charles Kunes, a Susquehanna scout. During the course of our conversation he mentioned some interesting aspects about the upcoming Juniata vs. Susquehanna football game to take place on Saturday, Oct. 7, 1972.

"When Juniata plays Susquehanna you might throw the record books out the window for a game of this intensity. The rivalry between the schools is so much that you cannot pick a winner from stats. Susquehanna's plus point is their defense and if we can force J.C. turnovers and capitalize on them, we should win."

Mr. Kunes also cited several players to watch for. On defense, Pat Gallagher, John Strawoet, Charlie Buckler and Mike Fabian are the faces to watch. While on offense, fullback Randy Kissinger, and halfback Dave Bagale and Bob Veach lead the Crusader attack.

To date Susquehanna has a 1-2 record, with a victory over Grove City and losses to Wilkes and Westminster.

Runners Capture A Pair of Wins

by Bill Robison

Despite the downpour of rain and muddy conditions the Juniata harriers slid to a 16-47 victory over the Johnstown branch of the University of Pittsburgh last Wednesday. In the process of winning, the Juniata Cross Country team evened their record at 1-1.

Again it was the youth that scored for the Juniata runners. Freshman Jack McCullough, who had finished first for the Juniata team in their initial meet, was the first across the finish line. The course record is 24:47 and considering the conditions, Jack's time of 26:10 was excellent. Brian Maurer, in spite of persistent blisters took second place. Following up the leaders for Juniata were; freshmen Paul Wilson (3rd), Steve Hooper (4th), and Steve Gretz edging out Doug Crosby and Bill Kibler by one second for 6th.

University of Pitt-Johnstown takes another shot at the J.C. Cross Country team on Oct. 14th, Homecoming, at Juniata.

In another strong performance, the Juniata Cross Country team topped the Lion harriers from Albright by the score of 22-31. It was Juniata's first home meet and also marked the first M.A.C. contest for Juniata.

Setting the pace was Brian Maurer of Juniata who was timed at 26:18 for the 4.9 mile course. Wayne Siefer, turning in a 26:48, came in 2nd and was the first Albright runner to finish. Jack McCullough of Juniata nipped Jim Blankehorn of Albright for the 3rd spot and then "Mitchell's Men" put the meet away. Paul Wilson (5th), Steve Hooper (6th) and Jim Bowen (7th) came across the finish line in a 25 second span. Steve Gretz (8th) and Bill Kibler (9th), although not scoring, displaced two more positions and contributed to the winning effort.

The win puts Juniata one up on the winning side of the ledger over-all and 1-0 in the M.A.C.

military, big business, and special interest groups." He asserted the President "worked behind the legislative scenes" to block youth participation in the electoral process. Creighton expressed particular concern over Nixon's vetoes of educational, since the Student NEA is composed of college students who are preparing to enter the education profession.

The youth leader charged that the Administration had overblown certain events at the Republican National Convention which he declared were designed to give the false impression of overwhelming youth support for the Republicans. In contrast, McGovern "did not bus us around to applaud for him as Richard Nixon did in Miami."

"We find it disconcerting," Creighton continued, "that the Nixon Administration placed an extremely low priority on youth involvement for 40 months and then in the 6 months before the election time, that position was reversed in an effort to win another four years in the White House."

Referring to the "now infamous statement" President Nixon was reported to have made, Creighton said: "George McGovern will not refer to this country's young leaders as bums, and George McGovern's vice president will most assuredly not become a vehicle to stymie youthful leaders."

Dolnikowski Returns From Sabbatical In W. Germany

by Ron Mowen

A special person at Juniata is back from a two year stay in West Germany. Professor George Dolnikowski is back from serving as Director of the Brethren College Abroad Program.

Professor Dolnikowski says about being back, "I'm happy to be back at dear Juniata. In a sense I'm a freshman this year. Things are new to me — the new curriculum, new people, the campus has changed."

Professor Dolnikowski has a most exciting background. He was born and raised in Russia. He graduated from the Institute of Foreign Languages in Moscow and served as an interpreter in the Red Army during W. W. II. While in the army, Dolnikowski was wounded and taken prisoner by the Germans.

Professor Dolnikowski never returned to Russia after the war. He remained in Germany. He explains it in this manner, "I had no home to return to My father who was an elder in the Russian Orthodox Church was sent to Siberia. There was no reason to go back." Another point he made was, if he had returned to Russia, he would have been placed in prison. The Russians felt, "If you had been taken prisoner, you were a traitor. One must fight until the last drop of blood is out of the body. Many who returned were taken to prison," says Dolnikowski.

After the war, Dolnikowski moved to Austria, where he found a job as a cook with the American Army. While in Austria, he came in contact with the World Church Service. Through W. C. S. he was able to come to the United States. He arrived in New Windsor, Maryland in December, 1949.

W. C. S. arranged for Professor Dolnikowski to secure a job at Juniata as a janitor. After arriving at Juniata, he began to take courses while working. Through private instruction, courses at J. C., and credits transfered from the Institute in Moscow, he was able to graduate from J. C. in two years.

Professor Dolnikowski then went on to both the University of Pennsylvania and Harvard University to do graduate work. In 1961 he returned to Juniata as a professor of German and Russian.

In 1970 Professor Dolnikowski was asked to go to Marburg, West Germany to serve as Director of the Brethern College Abroad Program. He accepted the position and spent two exciting and interesting years in Marburg.

Professor Dolnikowski returned to "dear Juniata" in August of this year. He is currently serving as the B. C. A. Coordinator here, teaching principally Russian, and as a freshman seminar leader.

A quite ironical event that clings to Professor Dolnikowski's mind is a dream that he had when he was very young. His mother went to a gypsy to find out what the dream meant. The gypsy told his mother that her son would leave home and never return. However, he would have quite an eventful life. Professor Dolnikowski quite agrees with the gypsy. He describes his life as very eventful.

Coronation of Homecoming Queen Among Events Planned for Weekend

by Henry Siedzikowski

Every college campus has its big weekends, and, on just about every campus, Homecoming Weekend is one of these. For Juniata, the big day is this Saturday.

The preliminaries for the weekend are already going on. The nominations for Homecoming Queen have already taken place, and the voting will soon follow. Nominated were five seniors and three juniors. The seniors were Mary Lou Carpenter, Mary Krone, Kerry Jo Clelan, Chris Tomlinson, and Marsha Saylor, and the juniors were Marilyn Moore, Kathy Barr, and Nancy Eisenbeiss. Besides the Queen and her court, the day will also feature class floats, making a return after an absence of one year. All the classes are now in the process of planning and building their floats.

Of course, a big attraction on Homecoming Weekend is always the football game. This Saturday will feature the Juniata Indians against Westminster.

Other attractions have been added to the weekend to make it even more exciting. As usual, the alumni will be returning, and there will be plenty of activities besides the football game to keep them busy. On Friday, October 13, the returning alumni will be invited to audit the regular fall term classes. It is intended to acquaint them with the new academic program.

Also, on Saturday morning, there will be an alumni-student symposium to allow old and new Juniata students to exchange ideas and discuss current topics. The college bookstore will hold an open house in the morning to allow alumni and families to listen and talk to members of the Admissions and Financial Aid staffs.

After the usual events such as the President's Reception after the game, the alumni-student golf tournament and walking tours of the campus, the weekend will be topped off with a concert by "Seatrain", a seven man country rock band.

The weekend activities will close on Sunday morning with an all-college worship service in Alumni Hall.

Play, Dramatic Oratorio, And Tour Slated For Concert Choir

by Dave MacVeigh

Bruce A. Hirsch, director of the Concert Choir, holds several reasons for having a choir. He thinks that it "fulfills the needs of students" interested in music. "Music is a performing art," says Hirsch, "and here is a performing organization." The choir enables students to "experience an organized ensemble." He feels that the Concert Choir is a "unique organization . . . It is the only department-sponsored club that meets nine months a year."

The Choir's first major project of the year is the play "You're A Good Man, Charlie Brown" starring John Summerville as Charlie Brown and Judy Rosen as Lucy. Others in the musical are: Patty- Debbie Holsinger; Schroeder- David Bombaugh; Snoopy- Frank Pote; and Linus- Philip Woodworth. Terry Tomassetti is the Production Manager and Debbie Smith is the accompanist. It should be noted that the Choir is doing all the work for their production, scheduled for October 27-28. This includes painting sets, lighting, etc.

Plans are not yet definite, but an eight-day tour that will take the Choir to Central and Northern Pennsylvania, New England, New York City and possibly Maryland is scheduled for March 11-18.

At the end of the year, the Choir hopes to do the dramatic oratorio "Joan of Arc at the Stake" by Arthur Honeggar. Several smaller events are planned, such as singing at the kick-off dinner for the United Fund in a few weeks.

When asked if there were any outstanding members of the Choir, Hirsch remarked, "Each individual is an equal member and they all produce 100%.

Alfarata Distributed; Need Help Next Yr.

by Jim Hunter

"It's not bad, ya know," sighed a Juniata senior as she examined the 1972 Alfarata. "It could be better, but I think it's pretty good." Her statements were reflective of many Juniata students concerning this year's Alfarata. One junior said, "Fair, considering students are limited in time that they can work for it." The understaffed Alfarata team is now very busy distributing the yearbook. They are also busy preparing for Homecoming when the yearbook will be distributed to last year's seniors. The staff makes sure all the seniors receive their yearbooks. If not picked up at Homecoming, they receive the Alfarata via the United States Postal Service. However, only seventy-five percent of the remaining students pick up their yearbook, although it costs them nothing to do so.

Mary Ann Repman, the Editor-in-Chief, heads the Alfarata staff, and expects to have ten to fifteen workers this year. Last year the staff was only eight, and Ms. Repman stated a definite need for more students working. Anyone interested should contact her. Rick Replogle,

Comm. Theater Seeks Players

by Bruce Bordner

Who needs you? Well, the FBI, the Mafia (sorry; the reputed "Mafia"), the Army, Navy, Air Force, Sam's Car Seat Repair, and many other organizations would doubtless take you, but wouldn't you really rather have fun while being taken? (Those who said, "No, money," are requested to examine their souls. Do take your time.) Actually, only those who find a perverse pleasure in exhibiting themselves to a theatre audience will find enjoyment here, as I am herein publicizing the Huntingdon Community Theatre, a small non-touring company with an excellent growth potential. We are a group of odd, but likable characters, quite willing to welcome actors, directors, writers, stage designers, and/or tap dancers to our inner circle.

The projected schedule for 72-73 is workshops on various plays until January, then to begin a play season of two major plays and a musical. This, however, can and hopefully will be expanded if we attain a larger membership. (Student-written and directed plays

Collins Blasts Shuster In Alumni Hall Talk

by Patrick Minnick

Earl P. Collins, Democratic candidate for Pennsylvania's Ninth Congressional seat in Washington, blasted his opponent, E. G. Shuster, and the Nixon Administration, in Alumni Hall Wednesday, October 4. Collins, a businessman from Tyrone, voiced a theme that has been expressed by Anti-Shuster Republicans as well as by members of the district's minority party Democrats. He reminded his audience of students, professors, and townspeople that Shuster only became a Pennsylvania voter in January and is not likely to be familiar with the needs of the people in this region. Shuster, until recently a high RCA executive, will not represent the people, but will work for big business, according to Collins.

"Elmer Shuster will go to jail," charged the Democratic candidate, and then proceeded to produce a paper prepared by the Collins' campaign lawyers which indicated that Shuster was involved in stock manipulation and other financial malfeasance. Collins also attacked the Republican for "refusing to appear in public with me and debate on the issues."

Richard Nixon received a blast of the Collins rhetoric as the candidate pointed to the continuing war in Vietnam which is still producing deaths, cripples, and drug addicts. He recommended a "Marshall Plan for the U.S." which would use the funds presently appropriated for use in Indochina for social programs at home. Collins was also highly critical of the administration's domestic record and pointed to unemployment, inflation, and

by Henry Siedzikowski

On Wednesday, October 4, the freshmen class went to the polls to elect the members of their steering committee. Ten candidates were running for the seven positions which were open.

When the results were tallied, the winners were Don Brosius, Mary Beth Campbell, Terry Coder, Guy Cooper, Cherie Dettmar, Jane Irwin and Marsha Rowland. Don Brosius was the leading vote-getter with 125 votes. Guy Cooper and Marsha Rowland also cracked the century mark in votes.

The winners were put to work immediately, planning the bonfire, pep rally, and the freshmen float. According to Brosius, the turnout at the first official freshmen class meeting was encouraging.

The steering committee will be meeting soon to elect its chairmen, secretary and treasurer and also to make plans for the coming year.

EDITORIAL

by Henry Siedzikowski

It is said, by men who know considerably more than I do, that people read a newspaper to find out what's going on, but they are interested in a newspaper because they like to hear what other people say. Despite my basically argumentitive nature, I'm going to let this point pass, at least for the time being.

I have one good reason for doing this, namely, I believe it's true. However, I'll return to form by stating what I believe to be a counterpoint. From my experience, I have found that although people want to hear what other people have to say, the vast majority seem to be reluctant to say anything.

If this seems somewhat odd, consider it in the text of a newspaper. It's no longer odd, it is ridiculous. A newspaper, by definition, is a form of communication. Communication, by definition, is a two way process of telling and listening.

It seems to me, however, that for this process to work well, we need participation by the readers. We can report the news and we can even give you our opinions. However, these are the opinions of tions of the paper have not been a few, and it is left to the many, that is the readers, to express their opinions so that there may be clear alternatives.

An instance I would like to point to, occured in the first issue of this year. I came out in an editorial and wholeheartedly condemned the President of the United States. After securing several safty devices to protect myself in case of a riot, I settled back and began to wait. It now appears that I made a slight misjudgement. Not only was there not a storm, but there was not even a trickle of agreement or disagreement.

After pondering for considerable time over this amazing fact, I came to the conclusion that there are two possible answers. First, maybe people don't know where to write to. If this is the problem, get the letters out of the desk drawers and either send them to the Juniatian through the intercollege mail or drop them in the Juniatian office downstairs in Ellis Hall.

The second answer is that readers feel such comments are either meaningless or have little effect. This is the primary reason why the Grass Roots and Pro and Con sec- utilized. They provided an excellent chance for students to say

Dr. Henry Masters Continues Visual Research Program

Under the direction of Dr. Henry G. Masters, assistant professor of psychology at Juniata College, a group of students has been studying the visual behavior of Cebus monkeys and white rats in a program of research aimed at learning more about visual perception.

For the third straight year Dr. Masters has received a grant from the Grass Foundation of Quincy, Massachusetts for his experiments. This grant, by a vote of the trustees of the Grass Foundation, has been increased from $3,000 to $5,000. It, as well as the previous grants, is meant to encourage under-graduate study in the field of neuro-psychology.

"This type of research," according to Dr. Masters, "makes psychology become more real and exciting to the student. For instance, the neural surgery used in the experiments is new to undergraduate studies in this area and is unique in Juniata's curriculum.

Six undergraduates conducted research projects last year under Dr. Masters' supervision. These included 1972 June graduates John Elmo, Phillipsburg, N.J.; Mark Mann, Cheltenham, Pa.; and Keith Ball, Piscataway, N.J. Also included, were present seniors Thomas Irwin, Philipsburg, Pa.; Lauren Ernst, Bernville, Pa.; and Bruce Glaeser, Manchester, Md.

A research project specifically supported by the Grass Foundation and carried out by Cathy Podgorski (Juniata, 1972) and Dr. Masters has been published in the journal "Psychonomic Science." The subject of the article is a comparison of humans and Cebus monkeys and their ability to judge the minimal height differences of cylindrical volumes.

Dr. Masters received his Ph.D. in 1968 from Kansas State University in physiological psychology. He has published a number of papers in the American Journal of Psychology and other scientific journals on the adaptability of humans and animals to their environment.

Grease Flies On Sat. Night

by Gary Gillen

Saturday night, the sophomore class sponsored a Sock Hop. The objective was to get everyone to dress up in the fashion of the fifties, and stomp to the music of Chuck Berry and the greats of that era. That was the idea, however, as usual, only a few played the part of the greasers and the vast majority just came and stomped to the music. The evening was highlighted by the appearance of the "Bad Mutha's", who showed not only their ability to dance, but to sing as well. All those who showed up appeared to have a good time, as it was a change of pace to jitterbug and twist instead of doing the Robot and the Scubby. There were prizes awarded for the best greaser guy and girl, best stomping-couple. Many other albums were given out during the course of the evening. All in all, a good time was had by all who attended.

If "The Juniatian" were to give a Story of the Week Award, Chris McFarland deserves it for last week (Oct. 4).

His article didn't seem to merit the front page, where the on-campus political scene made the big news. In addition to the headline story on Juniata's new freshmen senators, we read of other political happenings, Democratic congressional candidate Earl Collins visited Ellis Hall to persuade students that he deserved their vote.

The campaigning didn't stop on page one. Turning to page two, we skimmed a McGovern political pitch from a student education association. It seems that wherever we turn, demands are constantly being made on our loyalty.

—Teacher pressure.
—Friend pressure.
—Athletic team pressure.
—pressure, Pressure, PRESSURE!

So, where does our loyalty belong?

That's where Chris McFarland's article comes in again. He told how last winter he had dropped out of school — supposedly "for a change from the academic atmosphere."

"Yea, that's what happens when we dish to much loyalty out on the books," one might hear.

The fact is, Chris found there is only one place where we can place all our loyalty with complete trust that we will not be failed in doing so. His story of finding a real God, a personal Father, in his own life is the ultimate question, and the ultimate, satisfying answer of "Where do we put our loyalty?"

Regardless of your personal kick in life, I challenge you to consider the question of ultimate loyalty.

Let me close by giving a brief incident that occurred in my life while riding across America this summer — on a bicycle along with 47 other fellows. One day as we rode through the state of Wyoming, I was sick. But being sick while riding cross-country means just that — you're sick while you ride cross-country. In one particular stretch I was having a terrible time. From behind, a fellow-rider came up to literally push me down the highway. His gesture was, itself, like a shot of miracle drug.

Loyalty — where is yours?

by David Miller

It was undoubtedly the greatest thing to hit Juniata since All Class Nite — a Sock Hop put on by the Sophomore Class. The turnout was amazing. Duck tails flew, grease was golden, the floor shook because of the stomping, and a bunch of "rowdies" known as the "Bad Mutha's" frequently stole the show.

Anita Kustanbauter was absolutely gorgeous! She came dressed in a long black skirt, white sweater ponytail, saddle shoes, and of course, bobby socks. She won for the "best dressed bobby soxer" even before entering the dance. Frank Pote took "best greaser" with his ultra-greased pompadour. Peggy Smeal and Lenny Stumph walked off with "best jitterbugging couple" as Mark Bare and Nancy Preston stomped off as the "best stomping couple". Also, prizes were awarded to John Sokel, Karin Ritchie and also to Tom Wynn and his "Betty Lou" for the "Spot Dance".

It really kills me about all the pople that complain, "Aw, there's nothing to do on this campus!" So they went home and missed out on a really good time (it was advertised for two weeks). Sorry that it cost a little; if the Soph Class didn't raise a little money, Geoff Clarke and myself would be selling pencils outside Ellis Hall.

A lot of credit is due to Bruce Wolfrom who worked the turntables, Chuck Knouse and Pete Hoover for their efforts, and also to a WJC alumnus, Rich Trimble.

The Sophomore Class wishes to express their gratitude to all of the people that made the Sock Hop a great success. You know, it looks like "ROCK AND ROLL IS HERE TO STAY".

THE BIG HOUSE

by Richard Mettler

What is laughter? What intangible quality is it that causes us to double up and cringe in a convulsion at the sight of someone slipping on ice? Of all the reactions experienced by man, laughter is the only one that cannot be explained. Some say that it is a homeostatic reflex to keep from becoming insane. They believe that the realization of the absurd puts the human mind perilously close to the brink. Others maintain that laughter is a sign of insanity. It is their belief that after critical analyzation we should find few matters, if any, that sanely elicit a humorous response. But no matter how you rationalize laughter, there is one sure result upon seeing Pete Bagdonovich's "What's Up Doc?"; you will laugh. Peter Bagdonovich has combined many, it not all, of the basic vintage examples of slapstick humor. The elements of humor used in his film have stood the test of time. People have been laughing at this type of humor for many years and will continue to do so for many years.

The story revolves around the misadventures of the daughter of a judge, Barbara Streisand, who is sent to college, although she never lasts too long in any one, as she is expelled for such fiascos, as accidentally blowing up chemistry labs. Since she is in between enrollments, she seems to have directed her ability for disaster at a musicologist, Ryan Oneal, who is applying for a grant to further his work in the importance of certain minerals in musical development. Many things begin to happen when his suitcase of minerals is mixed up with like suitcases of stolen Pentagon papers and precious stones.

This movie is not an intellectual experience which requires sophisticated plot and character analysis. The obligation of the patron ends after he purchases a ticket and finds his proper seat. At this point all he need do is sit back, look at the screen, and laugh.

Peter Bagdonovich has simply combined the essence of pure comedy, complete with an unbelieveable chase scene, to construct a film completely devoid of sex, perversion, and profanity.

The event has become increasingly popular, and is attended by many townspeople and has been covered by local newspapers and television stations. Any members of the student body (yes fem libers — you too) are eligible and entry blanks can be picked up at the Information desk at Ellis Hall.

Indians Overcome Crusaders 17-0 In Third MAC Clash, Record Now 2-1

by Tony Martuzas

Well, the Indians have finally done it, racked up some points and shutout their opponents. Last Saturday in Selingsgrove, the Blue and Gold finally came to life in the second half as they trounced Susquehanna 17-0 to make their MAC record 2-1.

The team was really up for this game, the defense was hitting hard as usual. Jim Rossi made his first appearence as quaterback, he ran well on the option plays, but he just couldn't produce a score. A Mike McNeal field goal put the Indians ahead 3-0.

The Indian front line of Tom Herrman, "Bull" Johnston, Jim Rescigno, Tom Wynn, and Larry Cerny were very effective shutting off the run, and also causing the Crusader quarterback to find a nice soft spot on the ground whenever they came.

In the second half, the Crusader quarterback was hit by a gang of Indian defenders and the ball squirted loose. Defensive End Larry Cerny gathered it in and raced in for score.

The Indian Defense was really put to the test when Carmen DeFrancesco fumbled, deep in Indian territory. Here the Indian defense was not about to yield an inch to Susquehanna's Offense. The Crusaders failed to score with their four chances.

When the Indians got the ball, they started deep in their own territory and marched all the way down to the Crusader four yard line. During the long march, Greg Kennedy advanced the ball by sweeping the corners and catching a couple of swing passes while Mike McNeal kept crashing through the middle. After losing a couple of yards with the ball now on the Crusader Six, Greg Kennedy took a Gary Shope flip and steamed for the endzone. He didn't get in because the ball was 8 inches from the goal line. His head was the only part that was over. It was one of the best calls by the officials I've seen so far this year.

Anyway, Susquehannah was stuck on their own goal line, and naturally, the stubborn defense was not about to give them any running room. Later, Dee Adcock intercepted a Crusader pass on their own twenty, which set up DeFrancesco's score.

After Lou Eckerl got jammed up in the middle of the line, Carmen DeFrancesco took the flip and sped into the endzone corner for the final score, standing up all the way. Lou Eckert's block was the one that sprung him into the endzone. So that's how the game ended: Juniata 17, Susquehanna 0.

It's good to see the Indians back to their winning ways again. They are up for a rough contest at Homecoming; they'll be taking on Westminister.

something, but, they fell to disuse because of the feelings that they were meaningless and ineffectual.

To counter this trend, I'd like to just bring up a couple of examples of the speaking out that went on last year. One was a running debate between two students over the new curriculum, which appeared in the Letters to the Editor section. For those who read it, it provided a great deal of insight into the good and bad points of the new curriculum.

The second was a swarm of letters which appeared just after All Class Night. The review of the freshmen play had been derogatory. The freshmen who wrote in, saw their letters in print and could at least know that they had defended themselves.

To close, I will again make a plea for letters and guest editorials. If you have something to say, you owe it to yourself and everyone else to say it to more people than the kids on your hall. Write it in and say it to the school. It can't hurt and it could help.

Harriers Score Another Win In Meet Against Susquehanna

by Bill Robison

Last Saturday, Oct. 7, against rival Susquehanna, the Juniata Cross Country runners scored an impressive victory over Susquehanna at Selinsgrove, Pa. The win evened their season's record at 3-3, and put them 2-0 against M.A.C. schools.

This time the winning laurels went to Steve Hooper of Juniata, a freshman from Altoona, Pa. His 26:27 clocking bested second place finisher Dennis Endres of Susquehanna by 4 seconds. Third place went to Ray Everngam of Susquehanna but then Juniata proceeded to place in the next five positions. The remaining finishers for Juniata were Jack McCullough (4th), Bill Kibler (5th), Jim Bowen (6th), Doug Crosby (7th), Mark Edgecomb (8th), and Bill Demuth (10th).

The next meet will be quite a challenge as Juniata takes on Bucknell and F&M in another non-conference tilt at Lancaster, Pa. Johnstown-Pittsburgh will be the opponent for the J.C. runners on Homecoming.

Despite losing two on the loss column, Coach Jack Swinderman was pleased with his team's performance against Indiana University and Lock Haven State last Wednesday at the Juniata course. He described the meet as a "training meet" in which the J.C. cross country team members could improve their individual times despite being defeated by two larger and non-conference schools. The desired effect was evident as each Juniata runner improved his time from the Saturday before. Indiana defeated J.C. in a shutout 15-50 while Lock Haven took the Indians 16-42.

The first place finisher was Bill Hampton of Indiana University who was clocked at 24:33, just 20 seconds off the J.C. course record. The second place finisher, from Lock Haven State, was Mike Gage, five seconds off the winning pace.

Juniata's five scorers were; Jack McCullough, Steve Hooper, Bill Kibler, Jim Bowen, and Doug Crosby.

A big blow for the Juniata harriers was the loss of Brian Maurer for the season because of knee problems.

cross-country team will be running the twenty mile course.

Half of the money raised will go to Project Concern. Project Concern's dedicated medical, dental, and educational staff is busy fighting afflictions all over the world, training local residents in basic self-sufficiency, and teaching the techniques of preventive medicine.

After expenses for the project have been deducted, the other half will be divided equally between local flood relief and a new camp for mentally retarded and emotionally disturbed children. The money raised in the Huntingdon area will go for flood relief in this area. The Jaycees are building the camp and need your support.

You may sign up to walk or sponsor a walker at Miller's Department Store, Juniata College (Ellis Hall), Huntingdon Area High School or Juniata Valley High School.

Soccer, Football, Tennis Make Exciting Week for Intramurals

by Vernne Wetzel

There was a lot of action last week in the intramural program. There are six different leagues actively participating in what looks to me like the best year yet for intramurals. Last week two 11-man soccer games were played; Huntingdon United took the Mob Squab 3-1 (goals for Huntingdon by Saylor-2 and Vonderheyde-1, and for Mob Squab Tim Jablonski-1), and Runamuck also defeated the Mob Squab 2-1 (Runamuck scores by Steve Dunkle and Paul Donahue, and Tim Jablonski scored 1 again for Mob Squab). The standings at the end of the week were

Runamuck	2	0
Mob Squab	0	3

In 6-man soccer last week, Hot Grazees defeated the Cripples 2-1, Gavin Ford scoring 2 for the Gazees and Bob Pritchard scoring 1 for the Cripples. In the other game, later in the week, the score was Kings High 4, Hot Gazees 2 (for Kings, Dunkle-2, Donahue-1, and Culler-1, and for Hot Gazees Brian Clemens-2). The standings last week were

Kings High	3	0

The leading scorer at the end of the week was Steve Dunkle with 5 goals.

In men's touch football, 4 games were played during the week. In the first game, Moose Platoon easily beat Ratzass 25-7 (for Moose Platoon Jeff Laudenslager-6, Mark Amatucci-12, Tim Jablonski-7 and for Ratzass Walt Prozialeck-6 and George Valko-1). The Marfils had a heyday against Jonsey & the Boys and defeated them 51-6 (for Marfils John Steele-24, Doug Walker-18, and Paul Sosnowski-1, and for Jonsey John Shuck scored 6). Later in the week the Northwest Wombats beat the Northeast Brewers 19-0 on scores by Mark Bare (6), Gary Gillen (6), and John Casp (7). In another game, Moose Platoon defeated the Marfils 18-13 (for the Platoon Jeff Laudenslager-6, Pat White-6, Jeff Wagner-6, and for the Marfils Dick Stewart-6, Paul Sosnowski-6, and Gelnett-1). Finally for the week, Dubois House took the Weathermen 20-0 on scores by Ron Tomcavage (12) and Mike Buckwalter (8). Standings at the end of the week were

Moose Platoon	4	0
Dubois House	3	0
Marfils	2	1
Ant Hill Mob	2	1
Northwest Wombats	1	2
Ratzass	1	3
Weathermen	1	3
Jonsey & the Boys	0	3
Northeast Brewers	0	3

Pat White still leads the league scoring with 36 points scored on 6 TD's.

In powder-puff football last week, the Amazons beat the J.A.'s 12-0 on two TD's by Michel Campbell, and the J.A.'s then nipped the Tussey Tigers 7-6 (Leslie Whittaker-7 for the J.A.'s and Barb Kosik-6 for the Tigers). The standings were

Amazons	1	1
Abecidarians	1	1

Michel Campbell and Cathy Dickey are tied for the lead in scoring; each 12 points to her credit.

In tennis, ladders I and II (men's singles) showed no changes last week, but in ladder III (men's singles), Gill Landis defeated Jeff Laudenslager to take the top of that ladder. In ladder IV (women's singles), Mary Stauffer moved into the top position and put Sue Smith into 3rd. Also in that ladder, Debbie Worrell took 4th from Lynne Grove who was dropped to 5th position. In ladder V (co-rec. doubles), Dave Harrison and Vernne Wetzel took 3rd from Ken Kurica and Karen Crawford who moved to 5th position. In ladder VI (men's doubles), Jim Combs and George Magruder took the top from Mike Werley and Dan McHenry who dropped to 3rd position. Other matches were played, but the challengers were defeated and no change in the ladder was made. Numerous additions and subtractions to the ladders were made, and ladder VII (varsity) was discontinued due to the start of fall tennis.

Women's field hockey practice will be held tonight from 6 to 7 behind Ellis (if rain, practice will be held in the gym). Any girls interested are still welcome and encouraged to come.

There are several rescheduled games for men's 11-man soccer and touch football. On Monday, October 23, Huntingdon United meets Runamuck at 6:00 on the soccer field. In football, on the 24th of October, Northwest Wombats meet Ratzass at 6:00 on field 1, and Marfils meet Dubois House at 6:00 on field 1. On the 25th of October, Northeast Brewers meet Dubois House at 6:00 on field 1, and Northwest Wombats meet Marfils at 6:00 on field 2.

Championship games will be played the 26th and 27th of October. In men's touch football, the top 4 teams are eligible, in 11-man soccer the top 2 teams, in 6-man soccer the top 2, and in powderpuff the top 3 teams. The tennis tournaments end as of noon, Friday, November 3. The person or duo at the top of the ladder will be declared the winner.

Homecoming Weekend Is Now Over But The Memories Still Live On

by Sue Blum

Well the super, unbelievable Homecoming weekend is now over but the memories still exist in the air. The big weekend started off with the "blazing" Freshman bonfire. There was a small turnout which was comprised of mostly the football players themselves, but the students who did come displayed the school's real spirit behind the football team. Among the activities was a "suprise visit" by the Westminister football team, actually the freshman girls in football uniforms. Now on to the big time. Along with Saturday morning came the return of the Alumni. If you looked into the bleachers of the football stadium many old as well as new faces could be seen.

While our Juniata Indians were fighting hard against Westminister, many students were hard at work on the floats to be presented at halftime. The theme was Tall Tales of American Folklore, and the seniors won for the best float depicting the tall tales of Casey Jones and Johnny Appleseed. They generously donated their money to the Jaycees Project Concern. The juniors came in second with their man Paul Bunyon. And the sophomores came in third with Rip Van Winkle. Last but not least, was the freshman class float displaying the good old Western saloon with their wellknown campus bartender Tim Reimer. Prior to this Marsha Saylor was crowned queen with her two attendants, Mary Krone and Marilyn Moore. Much credit should also be given to the Huntingdon High School band who put on a fine show. Also during the football game our Cross country team really made a sweeping victory. After the football game things quieted down to a delicious steak buffet dinner. The gym was then packed for the Seatrain concert at 8:00. Mudshark came on first followed by Seatrain to end the evening with a remarkable finale. No one should forget this homecoming weekend for a long time to come.

Schuster Denies Charges Hurled By Tabloid Article

by Patrick Minnick

The question and answer period after the speech proved more interesting and important than the address itself Wednesday October 11, in Alumni Hall as E. G. Shuster, Republican candidate for congress answered question after question posed by members of the rather skeptical audience. Shuster, especially toward the end of his talk, seemed ill at ease and was perpetually on the defensive, possibly because the broad and general answers he gave to questions did not satisfy his listeners.

One of the most important topics covered in Shuster's talk was the issue of a smear campaign, which Shuster claims is being waged by the Democratic candidate, Earl Collins. Shuster attacked a newspaper supplement of the Blair (County) Press (written by a Republican, incidentally) and said that the charges made in it were falsifications. The tabloid, which is being circulated by the Democrats, raises many questions about Shuster's background, the most notable of which is a statement that Shuster was involved with stock manipulations and other illegal financial escapades as a head of a corporation.

Repeatedly Shuster claimed, I am not guilty of anything and never have been, except for an occasional traffic violation." He characterized the paper as being part of a "mud-slinging" attack on his integrity, and he went on to say that some members of the press in this district, such as The Huntingdon Daily News, also saw the Blair Press supplement as an "irresponsible and vicious" smear.

The question of a debate between Collins and Shuster was again raised as one member of the audience went so far as to say that he could get a hall for the debate to be held in. Shuster, however, claimed that his schedule was too tight between now and election day, and that a debate was impossible. He stated that he had always been willing to debate Collins, but that it was too late now.

Sinful Street Creates Unique Night at Tote

by Ron Mowen

If you were busy Sunday night trying to get that assignment written for 8:00 class, you missed a fine time with Sinful Street, a unique be-bop'n trio, who made their last appearance of a seventeen day — fifteen engagement tour here at J.C. Sunday night.

Until five months ago the trio was a duo, composed of Dave Lester and Ms. Paula Lockheart. Now multitalented Mike Bressler has joined to form a happy threesome.

When asked after the performance just what type of music theirs is, Dave spoke up and said "Better than average." That it is. Sunday night they performed everything from bluesy "Baby Mine" to foot stomp'in-do your own thing "Snatch and Grab It".

"The Sheik of Arabia" performed with "authentic costume?" was a crowd pleaser. "Isn't It Great Doing

Croce Speaks On Chaucer In Second Lecture Series

Professor Gerald J. Croce presented the second lecture, entitled "Perversity in Chaucer or The Misplaced Climax" in the English Department's series at Shoemaker Gallery. Professor Croce showed where Geoffery Chaucer and his Canterbury Tales fitted in Medievil literature.

Little is known about Chaucer the man. Most of what we know is nothing more than "conjecture or balance of likelihood." Only very little of what we know of him is actually documented. We don't know when he was born or when he died. We also have no documents that speak of him as a poet.

We do know that he was employed by Edward III of England as a diplomat, and that he was a prisoner for a while during the Hundred Year War. We also know that Edward III paid a relatively high ransom for Chaucer's release. Chaucer was also on very good terms with John of Gaunt, Richard II, and Edward III's son, the Black Prince.

Chaucer left much of his later poetry including the Canterbury Tales unfinished. In fact the Canterbury Tales are so fragmented that scholars cannot order them

Library In Process Of Reorganization

by Dave MacVeigh

According to Robert Sabin, Director of Libraries, the L. A. Beeghly Library is being reorganized. All the periodicals, back and current issues, are being moved to the ground floor, a job that started two weeks ago, and that should be done in the next few weeks. All reference materials are being moved to the North end of the ground floor. Also, the books are being moved into the areas left vacant by moving the back issues of the periodicals. They are being arranged according to the Dewey decimal system. Previously, they had been in different sections of the library according to their respective disciplines. This reorganization should take 6-8 weeks.

Mr. Sabin asks that students "Please bear with us until the job is completed. I'm sure that it will

by Joe Sollenberger

What can be done to calm down a rock hungry crowd? Present them with Mudshark as an entree and Sea Train as the main course. This was the menue presented to the crowd in Memorial Gymnasium attending the Juniata Homecoming Concert.

The people descended upon Memorial Gymn for the feast, and JC was ready for them. Unlike the Byrd's concert, the organizers for this concert got the people in with little waiting. In fact the whole concert was organized above the usual JC standard.

Mudshark from State College kicked things off and soon the crowd was rockin', stompin', and just havin' a fine time. But the gang was thirsty for rock, and they weren't quenched until Mudshark closed with "Go Johnny Go."

It looked as if all of central Pennsylvania had gathered to feast on Sea Train. They weren't disappointed. If there were one word to describe this concert, then that would be smooth. There were no problems to be solved, and there were no mistakes made. Sea Train performed honkey tonk to "stoned music", and the crowd lapped up every sound.

Perhaps the most impressive section of the concert was the flute solo in the stoned music. Now just imagine someone playing harmony with himself on a flute with the effect of an echo chamber and a light touch of drums, then you can imagine the "Spirit of '76" marching right across the stage. In fact most would claim that they really

The editors reserve the right to print only non-libelous and responsible content and to edit all letters and commentaries submitted to The Juniatan. The staff also reserves the right to publish all full signatures unless the writer can supply valid reason for omitting his name.

Dear Sir:

Like, wow, man. Those letters from those Dave Miller and Chris MacFairlane cats were really outasight man. Dig it.

Like when they say they found God at Juniata it's really cool. Like I've been trying to find Him hanging around the physics department after class man, but I hear He got a gig teaching a course with Carlos Casteneda at MIT and like split man.

But like it's really heavy these guys have seen God and walked with Him and talked with Him. Like I don't want to put them down man. It's heavy. I know some cats who say they've seen UFO's, and like sometimes they get taken up in these saucers to Mars man. Dig it. Have you ever been to Mars? Far out.

But like I say man if these cats get their kicks by labelling their experiences "religious" and then spreading it around in a newspaper, well that's their bag man, and the Juniatian is as good a place to bury it as anywhere else.

Juniata's Berlin Wall

by Stephen Wesley

Why is there a cyclone fence surrounding the athletic field of Juniata College? Returning students should have taken note of this barrier by now which was constructed during the summer. It encloses, quite efficiently, the stands, the track, and the footbali field. Signs posted at several places along the fence state that the field may be used by Juniata staff members, faculty, and students.

On several different occassions I have attempted to enter the track area to make use of it, only to find my way barred by locked gates. As a student, I have a right to make use of the track, especially since I have contributed thousands of dollars for the use of the facilities of Juniata College. These signs on the fence are erroneous and deceptive.

Why did the powers that be construct this monument to the stupidity of man? Is it so that they can better collect the entrance fee for football games or other athletic events? There are better ways to do this than by constructing a monstrosity. Is it to prevent vandalism? I have not seen any damage done to the track, the field, or to the stands by vandals. If vandalism has occurred, I am unaware of it. The fence attempts to keep people out whether they are Juniata staff, faculty, and students, or people living in Huntingdon. Cleat wearing football players probably do more damage than anyone else. Should we keep them out?

The fence reminds me of the Berlin Wall. The Berlin Wall does not completely stop the flow of refugees from East to West, although the use of barbed wire and soldiers makes it a very effective deterrent. Will the Athletic Department put barbed wire, German Sheperds, and armed guards around Juniata's athletic field? Will a loud, mechanical voice from loud speakers a' la Big Brother blare out "you are in a restricted area . . . ?" Like the Berlin Wall, the fence cannot completely succeed in keeping people out. People will climb over it, and it will eventually come down. It symbolizes the paranoia of Juniata College. I am reminded of Robert Frost's lines in "Mending Walls": "Before I built a wall, I'd ask to know/What I was walling in, or walling out."

Lime

by Edward Kinchley Evans

How good are you at catching flies? If you think I'm talking baseball, wad up this paper and go somewhere and self-destruct.

I meant the little winged beggars that you eat, feed to spiders, or just pull their wings off and watch die. You know, you cup your hand quietly, wait until it lands nearby, then quicker than the eye can follow, it is captured securely in your fist; a victim awaiting your God-like decision.

In Stoker's novel "Dracula", a maniacal inmate ate them with great relish.

A small, terrible child with crew-cut hair in "Sherlock Holmes and the Spider Woman" walks a few steps, gives a quick little hop, darts his vicious intelligence our way, then on the wing, so to speak, grabs a specimen out of the air.

"Let it go", cautions the mysterious lady in black who has brought her charge to the very lair of our good detective. Reluctantly, the hand is opened and the fly temporarily escapes. The child looks around for the next adventure and our attention goes back to the woman. She is Gale Sondergaard, a beautifully wicked type you probably aren't too familiar with. You want to know why?.....seeing as how it's all wrapped up in a peculiar way with this being an election year.

Well, when this particular movie was made (shown Friday night at eight o'clock October 13th at Alumni Hall as part of the crime series) back in the late thirties, early forties, Sondergaard was always cast when the character needed intellectual depth and a certain International style or attitude. She was very busy as there was only her and Judith Anderson and the movies then were being written by high class writers and dialogue was not an insult to speak.

And then along came the Second World War. (you've heard of it? Oh well, no matter), it finally ended and with the cheering and ticker tape fluttering to a cold stop. America was faced with a fate worse than boredom or unemployment....COMMUNISM....an ugly we had been coping with ever since the Great Depression and other things you've probably read about in our 'once upon a time' past. Seems like a lot of them Hollywood people (actors and writers — not the bankers and movie moguls) had been a mite too interested in talking about and joining groups exploring various ways of curing social ills (not syphillis, breadlines) and afraid that their private lives and convictions might be being disseminated in their movies; they were 'blacklisted'. Meaning, Dr. Watson, that no one in the industry dare hire them. And so they fell on Hard Times. And so did America. We had the Winterkill experience of a man named McCarthy who updated George Orwell's 1984 and made it 'America 1950'.

Which brings us up to the time you were being born. Remember that? Another man named Adlai Stevenson was attempting to bring some degree of dignity back to the role of President. A pastured General said he would 'go to Karea' and end the war. And another man named Nixon went on national T.V. and gave his famous "Checkers" speech.

America was caught in their hands. Too bad we don't have a Gale Sondergaard to whisper "Let it go!"

S.G. Sponsers Colloquy

by Henry Siedzikowski

The second of Juniata College's big three weekends in October will occur this Friday and Saturday. While most of the activities will be at night, there will be a home football game with Lycoming on Saturday afternoon, to break things up.

The weekend is being sponsored by the Student Government and is being called Colloquy '72. The essence is on involvement and interest.

For those who don't know what a colloquy is, it is a difficult thing to describe, unless you experience it. They are held at a number of colleges across the country each year. Each is a unique experience, but if you've ever attended one, you have some idea of what they are like.

Last year, one was held up at Penn State, and a couple of years ago, one was held here at Juniata. If you're interested, talk to one of the upperclassmen who attended the last one.

On Friday night, the activities will start after dinner, at about 6:30. Besides a number of small workshops, there will be a series of major ones, dealing with important social issues. One will feature representatives from Zero Population Growth. Another will center on the pros and cons of abortion. There will also be one on Urban Problems, and one on birth control, with representatives of Planned Parenthood leading things.

Featured that night will be possibly a Congressman, and also, Robert Jublier, an attorney and head of the Pennsylvania Young Republicans. He was a speaker at the Student Government Leadership Conference, and says he is anxious to come to Juniata to speak.

Also featured will be Chief Frank Growling Bear, a leading spokesman for Indian rights, and a very able folk singer. He also puts on a puppet show, and has been known to do a war dance on request.

Saturday afternoon, after the football game, there will be more workshops. Also, there will be presentations from a McGovern representative and a representative of the College Republicans. During this time, Senator Mike Gravel and Harrison Wellford will be up in the ballroom talking to people on an informal basis.

There will also be workshops featuring local speakers. A county commissioner and representatives from local industry will highlight this group.

Then, on Saturday night, will be two speeches by the featured speakers. The first will be by Harrison Wellford, an executive director of Nader's Raiders. He will talk on consumer protection and the environment. Next will be Senator Mike Gravel of Alaska. Gravel is probably best known for his opposition to the Vetnam War, and for reading the Pentagon Papers into the Congressional record.

There will be no charge for any of the speeches or workshops. Students, faculty and people from the area are invited to attend.

by Richard Mettler

Upon seeing "Klute" with Jane Fonda and Don Sutherland I found that I was definitely affected by mixed emotions. The acting was good and the plot was novel and well-conceived.

The story revolves around the misadventures of a New York City model-prostitute, played by Jane Fonda. She is being harassed by a former client whom it is feared will make an attempt on her life. The scope of the plot widens as a small town policeman is brought in as a private detective. His friend has been missing and thought to be the one harassing Jane Fonda.

The only aspect of the film that I questioned was the superhuman feats performed by Don Sutherland, as Klute. I found it hard to believe that a small town cop who had never seen a big city could come to New York and proceed to do the impossible. Speaking for myself, I think that New York is confusing. One must live there for quite a while to become oriented, let alone to solve cases. But this is just my own feeble opinion.

As it turned out Klute was hired by the real perpetrator. The end of the movie was suspense personified, a climax that Alfred Hitchcock would be proud to claim.

All told I must admit that the flaws of the film seemed minimal compared with the fine qualities of suspense and plot.

with any degree of reasonable certainty.

Professor Croce's paper dealt with two Canterbury tales, "The Physician's Tale" and "Pardoner's Tale". Professor Croce sees Chaucer as playing a joke on the reader in these two tales. Professor Croce impressed how these two tales are prime examples of Chaucer's "perversity" in literature. His perversity takes mainly the form of a surprise. When we think of surprise endings the name we usually come up with is O. Henry. But long before O. Henry's time Chaucer was doing the same thing.

Chaucer wrote a human comedy —man and his condition. He took advantage of the writer's ability to be manipulated, by playing with the reader's expectations and experience patterns in the tale. Chaucer leads us to anticipate the climax of the tale at one point but delivers it at another. He does so because he wishes us to focus on the morality of the deed in the tale rather than the action. Chaucer does this through his sense of development and structure to control our expectations. Chaucer was truly dedicated to his art and intensely interested in writing and the problems of creation and invention.

Chaucer's Canterbury Tales render a universal theme. No matter how outdated the scenes and times, the morals with which he deals are timeless.

Nothing", a tale of Lester Schnuder and his dreams of Tahiti went over very well. Of course we can't forget the ever popular "My Eggs Don't Taste the Same Without You" complete with spoons played by Paula. "The Organ Song" by Bob Ross was by far the highlight of the first half of the show.

The second half of the show started with Paula soloing "My Daddy Was a Singer". Then on to a tasty lecture on prunes. Other goodies included "Come Along Ye Virginia Girls", a different version of "You Ain't Nothin But a Houndog", and nice and quiet "Baby Mine" written by Paula. To round up the show Paula sang "My Heart Belongs to Daddy".

Sinful Street's next stop will be Carnegie Hall with Gene Sheppard, then on to Max's Kansas City in New York. So if you missed Sinful Street, you missed some good ole banjo pickin, kazoo playing, penny whistle'n, toe tapping music.

ATTENTION

This year the Juniatian, in connection with several students in the Elections and Voting Behavior class, is running a poll to test the political awareness and candidate choices of the students here at Juniata College. In the latter part of this week or early next week, several hundred randomly selected students will be sent questionaires through intra-college mail. In order to obtain accurate results we would appreciate it if those reciving the questionaires would take several thoughtful moments to complete them. After they are completed please return them to Box 1187 or 1024. We greatly appreciate your cooperation.

Chess Club Forming To Play Area Teams

by Jim Hunter

This year, as in previous years, Juniata will have a chess club for all those interested in chess. The club, which meets on Wednesday night at 7:30 in the Blue Room of Ellis Hall, was formed for students. People who don't know how to play chess, can be taught, and those who want to play, can learn how to improve their game. The Chess Club is open to all students, and if enough interest is shown, the club will sponsor a team to visit nearby organizations. In previous years, the teams have played both local organizations, such as the Huntingdon State Correctional Institute, and not so local organizations, such as the Altoona Campus of Penn State.

This year the chess team, under the direction of Wilfred Fagot, features Scott Crawford. Scott has a rating 2020. (Bobby Fisher's rating is 2800.) To acquire a rating, one must defeat at least five rated players, and must continually play more to keep the rating. The more one wins, the higher his rating. Last week Scott played 27 simultaneous games, closing only one, and drawing one, while winning 25. If there is a traveling team, Scott will be the leader; however, a team is not possible without students, so come to the meeting on Wednesday, at 7:30 in the Blue Room.

be an improvement over the past." He stated that everyone in the library is "open to suggestions." and that "if students can't find what they want, to ask for assistance."

Two changes in policy have been made. One is that all books leaving the L. A. Beeghly Library must be checked at the front desk. The other is that an "open reserve" shelf has been instituted on an experimental basis. This means that if a faculty member places a book on reserve, a student in his class may use it. The book must not be taken out of the library.

Juniata Indians Defeated by Titans in Homecoming Game

by Tony Martuzas

It was a great day for Homecoming; the Huntingdon Area High School Band was there, dressed in their flashing red uniforms, the floats were back from being absent last year, and the stands were filled with JC alumni. Unfortunately, the Westminister Titans showed up.

Westminister had suffered their first defeat in three years, in their game against Washington and Lee. Westminister proved to be a tough team as they marched up and down the field during the first half.

The Titans were thwarted during their first drive as Gene McNamara faked the field goal attempt sweep, but Joe Coradetti was there preventing him from entering the endzone. Frosh Jim Rescigno and Bob Waggoner teamed up on the next play to stop Griffith dead in his tracks, but the Titan halfback was able to get in when he ran behind the blocking of his right tackle, Scott Colvin. After a couple of Indian penalties, the Titans were in good position to run the ball in for two, and they did.

Carmen DeFrancesco took the ensuing kick off and returned it to Juniata's own 39. With Lou Eckerl and Mike McNeal crashing up the line. Jim Rossi had the ball this time and was viciously up-ended.

and threw a wild pass to his tight end, Bill Fitts. The Indians couldn't move the ball either during their turn and were forced to punt.

With first and goal on the Indian ten, halfback Scott Griffith was cutting the corners on the middle, Greg Kennedy running the corners, and with help from a Titan penalty, the Indians found themselves on the twenty-three yard Titans recovered on their own twelve. After three unsuccessful passes and a timeout, Scott Griffith picked up the first down. McNamara found his halfback all alone swinging out to the flats and connected for the score. The extra point kick was good.

After another good runback from DeFrancesco to the Indian 45, Gary Shope dropped back to pass. Cornerback Poe McCaw intercepted and scampered all the way down to the 10 yard line. Scott Griffith capped the drive by diving over for the score. The PAT was good, Westminister 22, Juniata 0.

Well, that's about how the game ended, except that the Indians were able to score in the third quarter with Mike McNeal crashing over from the four yard line.

The Indians were pretty solid with the defense. Frosh Dan Ereditario stepped in for the injured Larry Johnston, and it was interesting to note that five freshman broke into the starting lineup (Jim Rescigno, Dan Ereditario, Steve Lehman, Jim Messner, and Barry Hartley). The Defense could definitely have been much better if the offense were an equally strong unit. (By the way, the Defense had their worst game so far this year against Westminister).

The Indian Offense looked solid during the opening game against Del Val. and the first half against Denison. Since then, they had only one good game, against Susquehannah. Lou Eckerl, Mike McNeal, Greg Kennedy, and Carmie DeFrancesco had to fight for every yard they gained. They can only be as good as the offensive line.

This Saturday: Lycoming.

He flipped vertically into the air and landed smack on his head, the ball squirting loose in the process. So much for that Indian drive.

Late in the second half, Mike McNeal had trouble handling the bad snap from center, and the

J.C. Harriers Drop 2 Toughies

In a record breaking time of 26:37.5 over a 5.35 mile course, Scott Bartram of Bucknell University, paced the Bisons of Bucknell to a tri meet victory over Juniata and F&M last Wednesday at Lewisburg, Pa. The scores were; Bucknell 15 — J.C. 50, F&M 15 — J.C. 40, and Bucknell 19 — F&M 40.

John Hargraves of F&M finished second as he pushed Bartram for the record with a 26:49.

The five scorers for Juniata overall were; Jack McCullough (14th), Bill Kibler (17th), Steve Hooper (18th), Jim Bowen (20th), and Doug Crosby (23rd).

Successful Homecoming for Cross Country Team

Before the Homecoming floats made their way around the track at College Field, the Indian runners displayed a fine show for the estimated 3500 fans in a 19-44 victory over Johnstown-Pitt. It was Juniata's second win over Johnstown-Pitt this year.

Setting the pace for his first individual victory of the year was Juniata freshman Steve Gretz from Gladwyne, Pa. His winning time was 26:50. Kurt Miller of Johnstown-Pitt was just 2 seconds behind for 2nd place, but after that it was all Juniata. Jack McCullough, Steve Hooper, Doug Crosby, Jim Bowen, Bill Kibler, and Dave Sims all made it across the finish line before the next Pitt runner finished.

Juniata's Cross Country record is now 4-5 with Elizabethtown, Delaware Valley, and Rider their upcoming opponents this week.

Warriors Scouted for This Week's Encounter

by Bill Robison

In another exclusive interview, this time with assistant football coach John J. Kutney of Lycoming College at halftime of Juniata's Homecoming game, this reporter came across some interesting facts relative to this week's football game with the Lycoming Warriors.

"Our offense is hurting in that we have scored only 3 points this season (it is now 6 points as of last Saturday's loss to Delaware Valley) but it's hard to say how we'll do against Juniata because we have played tough opponents so far this season. We also have a young team with freshmen making a considerable contribution to the team's effort."

Players to watch for on offense are: QB Bobby Mesaros, FB Kevin Rosenhoover, HB Sam Shiccatano, HB Fred Grieb and kicker Porfirio Goncalves (who has scored their 6 points). The defensive team is led by linebackers Tom Ostrowski, Steve Wiser and DB Vinnie Joy.

To date Lycoming is 0-4 with losses to Albright, Wilkes, Geneva, and Delaware Valley.

And so the handclapping and feetstomping went on, and on, and on, ... , and when things were finished the people pleaded for more, and more they got. Not an encore of one or two pieces, but they got an encore of four numbers.

And after it was over the people were satisfied. They had par-taken of the feast and had gone back to their domiciles to digest its content. And so it was for the Homecoming concert of 1972.

Well Known Personalities Speak At Juniata's Colloquy

Friday of Colloquy

by Patrick Minnick

Last Friday, October 20, a colloquy came to Juniata, but only part of Juniata's students came to the colloquy on Friday evening. The ball got rolling at 7:00 P.M. in Ellis with Mark Schecter, a member of the Executive Board of Directors of the American Civil Liberties Union as he gave a talk on student legal rights. He told his listeners of how student rights differ from those of the average citizen, mostly because students are not property owners and their rooms and apartments usually belong to their college. Therefore, authorities go to the school administration, instead of to the student when a search warrant might be in order.

Next scheduled to talk was Ms. Judy Starr of Planned Parenthood on "Sex and the College", but she was unable to appear because of a death in her family. The next speaker was Winston Chesney, Chairman of the Huntingdon County Commissioners, talking on "Elections and Voting Procedures." He spoke of the voter registration drive at Juniata and the more than one hundred students who are now registered voters of the town of Huntingdon.

At 8:00 in Oller Hall, Presidential politics came to the fore as Robert Jubelirer, Chairman of the Pennsylvania Young Republicans and a member of the Committee to Reelect the President, spoke in praise of Mr. Nixon and attacked Democratic Candidate George McGovern. He accused McGovern of planning to sacrifice a "position of strength" in Vietnam with his proposal to withdraw all the troops in ninety days. Jubelirer said he feels that we have a better chance of getting our prisoners back if we follow the strategy of simultaneously bombing and negotiating as we have been in Vietnam. He also lauded Mr. Nixon's foreign policy, especially his trips to Moscow and Peking and he stated that Nixon is "highly respected" among foreigners.

On the domestic front, Jubelirer rapped the Democrats for their handling of the Eagleton affair, commended Nixon for his economic policies including the wage-price freeze, and supported the president for his veto (which Congress has overridden) of the newest legislation on the environment.

The next speaker was Dr. Raymond Day, head of the Urban Studies Department at Wooster College and also a Juniata graduate. Day told his audience that "the answer to some segments of the urban crisis lie right on this campus." Not only educators for the ghetto children are needed, but also scientists to handle the problems of lead poisoning and rats, economists to solve the problems of high prices and low quality in the ghetto, and sociologists to handle police brutality and other social handicaps which are inherant to slum dwellers.

After Dr. Day, Chief Frank Growling Bear, a guitar and banjo playing Penobscot Indian, delivered his musical message about the long mistreatment of the native Americans from the first landing of the whites, to the social and economic slights of 1972. White man's rights, he philosophized, are a joke until those who originally owned this continent are given a fair shake.

After the speeches and performances in Oller, those interested journeyed to Ellis to hear Rich Gatto, Huntingdon County campaign head for McGovern. He systematically spoke of McGovern's plans, should he be elected, and

by Joe Sollenberger

This Friday and Saturday Juniata College presents "You're a Good Man Charlie Brown" as one of the features of Parent's Weekend. The play will be presented in Oller Hall, with curtain time being 8:15.

The play deals with some of the more familiar escapades of the Peanuts' characters. The problems of school life, Valentines Day, the redhead, baseball, and Snoopy are presented. Charlie Brown is followed through several seasons as his problems are disclosed to the audience. At the end of the story the gang's true feelings toward the blockhead are revealed.

The production is under the capable guidence of the Hirshes. That favorite blockhead is played by John Summerville, and Lucy is played by Judy Rosen. Other parts are Phil Woodworth as Linus, Dave Bombaugh as Schroeder, Debbie Holsinger as Peppermint Patti, and Frank Pote as Snoopy.

Faculty and students (the latter whose parents do not plan to take part in the weekend's activities) are encouraged to attend the Friday evening performance. All parents, faculty, and students who plan to attend Saturday evening's performance will need tickets. Parents have been given the opportunity to reserve tickets when they make their reservations for the weekend. Students and faculty may pick up tickets for Saturday evening's performance in the Office of Alumni Affairs. All tickets are complimentary.

This first production will provide a fine evening of entertainment in contrast to the politicking that took place on the Oller stage this past weekend. Laugh at the problems of Charlie Brown and forget about the campaigns this weekend.

Jaycees' Walk for Mankind Brings In $4,000 and 412 Aching Feet

This past weekend on the Juniata campus was one of involvement. The trustees were holding their meetings here, and Student Government was sponsering a colloquy. Also on this theme, the Pennsylvania Jaycees and the Huntingdon area Jaycees sponsored a Walk for Mankind.

This was an involvement project, with 206 walkers attempting to walk the twenty mile course. Each walker was sponsored by people who pledged so much per mile walked. Over 120 of the walkers finished the course. The walkers came from all age brackets from grade school children to retired people.

The Alter Roch Jaycees, which is a chapter of the Huntingdon Correctional Institute provided food for the walkers when they finished the course. They had sandwiches, drinks and chips waiting for them.

Andrew Murray, Juniata's Campus Minister termed the project "definitely worthwhile", and said he felt it created "good community spirit". If all the pledges are collected, the walk will have brought in about $4,000.

Half of the money raised from this project will go to Project Concern, Project Concern is the business of saving lives. They have helped people in need from the mountains of Appalachia to the devastated lands of South Vietnam. The organization is international, independant, and free of any religious or political ties.

The other half will be divided equally, after expenses have been deducted, between local flood relief and a new camp for mentally retarded and emotionally disturbed children. The Jaycees are building the camp and need everyone's support.

The walk began at 7:00 A.M. on Saturday, although walkers were leaving between 7:00 and 8:00 o'clock. There were checkpoints every two miles, so walkers could validate

Middle States Evaluation Comm. Visits Juniata

This is a big week for Juniata College. This is the week we are being visited by the Middle States Evaluation Commission. This is the board that will be evaluating Juniata for reaccreditation.

During the week, they will be looking over the campus, visiting classes and talking to students, faculty, and administration.

Dr. C. W. Huntley is the chairman of the commission. He along with the members of his group will be around looking for what is right and wrong with Juniata.

The group will hold several receptions during the week. These

JC Meal Tickets Create Trouble

Melted ice-cream, too much green pepper, seconds denied— such are the complaints heard at the weekly Wednesday food service meetings. The directors of JC's new food service listen carefully, hear all suggestions (and complaints!) and promise to do their damndest to give students the kind of service they want.

Of course, the big hassle right now is MEAL TICKETS. Although all agree that the new rule is a pain in the ass, it is for the benefit of the boarding students. Did you know that 40 high school kids used to drop in regularly for breakfast on the way to school? Or that 200 non-boarding students dropped in every day for lunch? So by cutting the outsiders, boarding students' money can buy better steaks and more desserts.

Letters to the Editor

Letters to the editor should be addressed to: Editor, The Juniatian, Box 667, Juniata College, Huntingdon, Pa. 16652. The editors reserve the right to print only non-libelous and responsible content and to edit all letters and commentaries submitted to The Juniatan. The staff also reserves the right to publish all full signatures unless the writer can supply valid reason for omitting his name.

To the Management Board of WJC:

Effective October seventeenth, I resign the position of Station Manager. I do so for purely personal reasons that are not the direct consequences of the station or the staff. I bear only the best of wishes for WJC in the future, and have full confidence in the General Staff, in the Management Board, and in Jim Pye who will be acting Station Manager.

I have only two recommendation: 1. I must congratulate all of you on the Board for the admirably consistent jobs you have been doing. Keep working on what is basic and important, pay attention to detail, and keep a healthy respect for yourselves, each other, and the position the station occupies in the social atmosphere of this campus. Strive for quality from the groundworks up, and everything else will follow. 2. I recommend Jim to you as your acting Station Manager with full and hearty confidence. Please take extreme care in the next several months in picking either a new Station Manager or Program Director. Jim will be able to do both jobs for the interim quite adequately. For this reason, I strongly suggest you do not consider adding a new person to the board for at least one month, and all the better if you can wait as long as three. This decision, when you come to it finally, will be the single most important decision of the year. Whoever is picked to fill P.D. or S.M. will be the deciding factor in determining the role and character of WJC for possibly as long as the next three years, and will have ramifications for easily another three. Please don't blow it. I will be happy to offer suggestions at a later date if you so desire, but I would like to for the moment emphasize that Jim's decision should be considered with great respect. He not only has far greater experience in the "political" workings of WJC, but also has I think fairly sound judgment. Last, but of the utmost importance, is Mrs. Goehring. I cannot tell you just how completely I trust her judgment. I charge you all to treat her advice with your complete respect, and though Mrs. Goehring will never try to tell you what you should do, you would be ill-advised to venture anything against her approval.

Sincerely,
Chuck Knouse

Dear Editor,

I have a question for "Chip", whoever he may be, (and I do wish he'd signed his full name; I'd like to meet someone who really talks like that.) So here's the question — do you believe in photons? The fact that you spend a lot of time around the physics wing indicates that you probably do. I know I do, and I'm only a math major. Even though I've never had one presented to me on a silver platter, I believe photons exist, and are an operational force in this world.

Now for the next step — I believe God exists and has an influence in this world, in fact I know He does, much more surely than I know there are photons. I've felt the effects of photon bonbardment, as evidenced by my (fading) suntan, but I've experienced to an even greater extent the workings of God, as demonstrated in (unfading) changes in my life and the lives of my friends.

O.K., so "that's my bag, man." But add to Dave Miller and Chris MacFarland and myself the fifty or one hundred other people on this campus who believe, multiply by the thousands of other colleges in this country, and then add all the parents and teenagers, old people and little kids, who also believe. It comes to quite a sum. And any of them would be willing to share with you anything you'd care to ask.

But don't (and I'm sure you won't) just take somebody's word for it. Give God a chance to prove Himself to you (something photons won't do for you.) And let me warn you — don't try this "experiment" unless you're willing to live with the results. Because once God then gave a critique of the failures of the Nixon Administration. Mr. Jubelirer was given a chance to reply and the audience was given a chance to question both men and their candidates.

Saturday Night Colloquoy

by Cindy Szczerba

The Juniata College Colloquoy of 1972 this past Saturday night highlighted the two day affair which featured Senator Mike Gravel of Alaska and Harrison Wellford, Executive Director of Nader's Raiders.

Wellford, presently a candidate at Harvard for a Ph.D. in Government, was the first Executive Director of the Center for Study for Responsive Law. Wellford, the first speaker, stated the basic principle which motivates the Raiders: To serve as a fair system of checks and balances among those who exercise power.

He cited a small Georgian town as an example of his work. This town was economically dependent on the paper mill. The problem was the social and political life was controlled by the mill officials. If any man dared challenge this petty dictatorship, his job, credit, and living were in jeopardy. A doctor challenged the system and he lost his medical license and his position in the State Legislature. Wellford was sent to solve the problem. The press, a CBS documentary, a visit to the state governor, even the justice department in Washington failed to provoke a response.

The point of the story was a system of checks and balances is needed when principles break down. The goal is to get responsiveness among the people through the Raider's Congress project: Get people interested and then through written profiles of government officials make the people aware of corrupt politians. Wellford hopes to put more than bandaids on the growing social problems.

Senator Mike Gravel took the floor next. He has become nationally known with his reading of the Pentagon Papers into the Congressional Record, and also nominating himself for the U.S. Vice-Presidency. He opened his speech with that "patriots" wouldn't like to hear criticism of the country, but he stated criticism is motivation for improvement. Before delving into any criticisms, Gravel mentioned the controlling forces in our society: corporations, government, and labor, but he he said minority groups can do something for themselves by banding together, examples given were Women's Lib and Black Power.

His criticisms dealt with defense, welfare and war. Gravel feels the public has the right to know what is going on in defense. He connected defense to foreign policies in which people of the United States deserve to know the arrangements their country is making with an alien country. The Senator said welfare is treated as a bad word — a vehicle of hate towards the recipient, and expressed the ridiculousness of the old philosophy: "As long as there are streets to sweep and gutters to clean the labor problem is solved."

He also attacked the defense attitude to outdo the enemy in arms. He calculated that to cripple the Soviet Union the United States would need 250 warheads. Gravel noted that by 1976, this country will have 14,000 warheads — the capability to "knock-off" the Soviet Union 56 times. Even in that Gravel said we're still ahead — the Soviet Union is only capable of killing us 22 times over. With these words, Senator Gravel closed his speech. A discussion group was held afterwards at Ellis Hall and thus the Colloquy is over for another year.

Nadzak Supports Fence

by Dave MacVeigh

What seems to be a major controversy has arisen on the Juniata campus concerning the chain-link fence around the football field, which was put there over last summer.

Football coach Walt Nadzak is the fence's major proponent. It was his idea to have the fence put up.

Coach Nadzak cited several reasons for having the fence. He thinks that it helps to ensure the safety of the football players, as well as help to prevent college athletic equipment from being stolen. Nadzak said that there have been several instances of broken glass on the playing field, as well as on the track. He said that, prior to when the fence was constructed, all the track equipment had to be taken in each night "at considerable expense to the college." He cited as an example of this the fact that 6 hurdles, valued at $36/hurdle, had been chopped up with hatchets. He said that foam rubber from the high jump pit was "scattered all over the place."

Nadzak said that although the fence cannot completely prevent damage or theft, it "discourages that type of thing." Contrary to the belief of many people, he says, the fence "was really not put up to increase revenues. Besides, all the recepts go back into the general college budget."

In reference to Stephen Wesley's article, which appeared in the Juniatian of October 18, Coach Nadzak said that the construction of the fence was not done with "one dime of Stephen Wesley's money. Not one cent came from the Juniata College budget — it was accomplished through outside donations that paid almost exactly the cost of the fence." Nadzak said that it was done "with money that Juniata College would never have received otherwise." He cited many examples of people who had contributed to the fence project, who had never before given any money to the college. He said that the fence probably "appealed to them."

Coach Nadzak stressed one thing that many people probably do not know. That is the fact that the field is open for student use until 9:00 p.m. every day, except from Thursday until Saturday of a home game weekend. This is so that the field may be lined. He says that the main gate is kept locked, but that the back gate that is 3' high that is nearest to the First-base line is kept open.

EDITORIAL

by Henry Siedzikowski

There are times when all reason seems to disappear and you just have to sit back and consider what is going on around you. After this weekend, it is time Juniata sat down and did this. Introspection is definitely in order.

This was the weekend of Juniata's colloquy. Senator Mike Gravel was there. Gravel is one of the most controversial, intelligent and articulate spokesman that his country has. Harrison Wellford was here. Mr. Wellford, as Executive Director of Nader's Raiders, probably knows as much about what is going on in this country as anyone.

There were other people there too. There were spokesmen for Nixon and McGovern. There was a speaker on student legal rights. There were speakers on urban and small town problems. And on a college campus, supposedly a center of intelligence and academic interest, there was an unbelievably small attendence. The major problem is that the campus is ours.

There are many arguments why the students didn't show up. Many went home because of the long weekend. Many said they didn't know what was going on, despite the fact that every student received a schedule in his, or her, mailbox. Many just preferred to sit in their rooms and do whatever they usually do on a weekend night.

However, the student apathy is not of primary importance. It is a commonly known fact that although just about every student comes to college with the intention to learn, most will not go out of their way to do so. What is disturbing, is the fact that a great many members of the faculty, those responsible for the cultivation of the minds of Juniata students, did not show up. If they could not find it within themselves to take advantage of such a major potential learning experience, how can they be expected to motivate and stimulate intellectual curiousity in their students.

It is a tough thing to think about, but for the sake of this college, I just hope some people do. And for those who were there, maybe you deserve more commendations than you think.

Purple Polecat Picks up Prize

No major championship was at stake, but the race was held anyway. The event was Juniata's annual Soap Box Derby.

The turnout wasn't very large this year, but the sense of competition and fun was not diminished. Those who entered went all out.

First place went to Richard John whose car was named the "Purple Polecat". Second place went to Tim English. Third place was taken by Bill Hirst and Dave Hawbaker and the fourth position went to John Knouse.

Despite the fact that the number of entries was small, the derby was colorful and exciting and afforded us all with a different way to spend a Sunday afternoon.

Who is this One?

Who rules the universe? Who controls the sparkling of the sun and the falling of the leaves? Who brings fresh cold air and the soft white snow of winter? Who supplies the living waters for the branching trees and the fading flowers? Who beholds the mountains and their beauty? Who can be seen in all the world?

Who formed you in your mother's womb? Who is the molder of personality? Who gives power to the faint and increases strength to him who has no might? Who is the giver of understanding and knowledge? Who has the ability to scratch you where you itch? Who refreshes and revitalizes the stale and the stagnant? Who uplifts the seemingly unimprovable? Who desires to be a personal friend to all? Who reaches out to all and is reachable by all?

Who makes the nations and their leaders as a drop in a bucket? Who holds truth and wisdom? Who has judgments sweeter than honey? Who is the fountain of life? Who is the epitome of justice? Who is changeless, but obtains changing power? Who has never ending love? Who remains the only one not polluted?

Who is this one that men hide their faces from? Who is this one, who is and who was and who is to come?

Do you think — just maybe — when you find out who this one is you may find out who you are?

will be held so that members can meet and talk with faculty and students.

At the luncheons they ask numerous questions concerning the college. They ask about the food service and the health service. They ask if there is drinking on campus or if there are any drugs.

They want to know if the new curriculum is working. Are there major flaws in it? Is it better or worse than the old one?

They are interested in political activism and involvement on campus. They want to know whether the majority are apathetic or not.

So if you see some strange looking gentlemen in suits wandering around the campus taking things in, look good. The impression made on them will be what the outside world knows about Juniata for the next few years.

There were also a couple of interesting sidelights to the affair. Juniata's cross country team raised over $250 by running the course and Dr. Hunter raised over $100 by jogging 21 laps of the college track. That's five and a quarter miles.

Fence

Of the football-playing schools in the Middle Atlantic Conference, says Nadzak, Juniata has the smallest budget for football. However, he feels that the Indians are "well-equipped."

Coach Nadzak feels that the fence "has beat the problem" of damage and theft of equipment.

Nadzak said that he "wishes that Stephen Wesley would have come to me first and get the facts" before writing his article. He said that he has "nothing to hide. If anyone wants to come in and talk with me about it, my door is open." The project, which started last April, took approximately 2½ months to finish.

Dr. Earl C. Kaylor, Jr. is a major opponent of the fence. Because the fence is already constructed, he thinks that the issue is not whether there should be a fence or not; rather, he thinks the important thing now is the right of students to have "free and ready access to the field." Apparently, he doesn't consider having a back gate open most of the time "free and ready access." He is concerned over the public relations impact of the fence. He feels that it "gives the public a bad image of the college." However, Dr. Kaylor doesn't want the fence to become a "divisive issue."

Kaylor thinks that the "NO Trespassing" signs are especially bad for the college's image. He thinks that they should be worded in a "gentler manner."

Despite A Cold, Wet Week Intramurals Proceed Normally

by Chuck Rahauser

Despite a rather cold, uncomfortable week for outdoor activity, the Juniata College fall intramural program continued in normal fashion. As the season heads down the back stretch, it seems that every game is an extremely crucial affair. In the 11 man soccer competition last week, Runamuck remained the only undefeated team by defeating Huntingdon United 1-0, and winning over Mob Squad by default. The league standings at the end of the week were,

Runamuck	5-0
Mob Squad	0-4

The league leading scorers are Paul Donahue and Steve Dunkle each with 3 goals. In the 6-man soccer event, Kings High continued their devastating pace by defeating Hot Gazees 4-1 (Jake Cullr 2, Jeff Culler 1, Steve Dunkle 1 for Kings High, and Wes Perkins 1 for Hot Gazees). Jake and his team then gained victory No. 5 as Cripples forfeited. The standings at the end of the week were,

Kings High	6-0
Cripples	0-5

The men's Intramural touch football games last week were again exciting as Moose Platoon was knocked out of first place. In that game with Ant Hill Mob, Lenny Brooks picked up the only score as the "mob" beat the Moose Platoon 6-0. Jonsey and the Boys beat the Weathermen 6-0 as Dave Musselman was the lone scorer. On Tuesday October 17, the Marfils crushed the Northwest Brewers 13-0, leading scorers being George Singly 6, Ed Frigo 6, and Craig Goeckell. Dubois House 38 and Jonsey and the Boys 0. In this awesome display of power the Dubois House was led by Don Heller 6, Ron Tomcavage 13, Keith Klein 7, Jim Slavick 6, and Mike Buckwalter 6. In the other games of the week Ratzass won over Ant Hill Mob and Moose Platoon defeated Weatherman, both games ending by default.

We recognize our league leading scorer— rompagious Ron Tomcavage who has thus for accumulated 61 points.

Team standings now read,

Dubois House	5-0
Moose Platoon	5-1
Marfils	4-1
Ant Hill Mob	4-2
Ratzass	3-3
Weathermen	2-4
Jonsey and the Boys	2-5
NW Wombats	1-4
NE Brewers	0-7

In the Powder Puff football league, the J.A.'s obtained full possession of first place by defeating the H & H, Inc. 6-0, the hero of the game being Leslie Whittaker who scored the only 6 points. The Abecedarians kept the pressure on the J.A.'s in their win over the Amazons 13-0. The lone scorer in this contest was Cathy Dicky. In the only other game of the week, H & H Inc. overpowered Tussey Tigers in a hard fought play 6-2. Nancy Agnew grabbed the points for the victors while Karen Anderson scored for the Tigers.

In our up to-date look at the league scorers, we have Cathy Dicky leading with 25 points.

Team standings,

J.A.'s	3-1
Abecedarians	2-1
Amazons	2-2
H & H Inc.	1-3

Winter Student Jobs Available In Europe

Winter student jobs are immediately available in Europe — as well as a large selection of jobs for next summer. This means that any student who is willing to work can easily earn back the $175 round-trip Youth Fare being offered by most major airlines. And a few more weeks on the job earns money for traveling around Europe.

Winter jobs are in ski resorts in Switzerland, Austria, and Bavaria. Summer jobs are in resorts, hotels, restaurants, hospitals, shops, and on farms in Switzerland, Germany, France, England, Spain, Austria and a few other countries. Many jobs such as hotel work in Switzerland, farm work in France, etc. do not require previous experience or any knowledge of a foreign language. However, to make certain every student gets off to his job on the right foot, the Student Overseas Services, a Luxembourg Student organization, provides an orientation in Europe.

Jobs, work permits, and other papers are issued to students on a first come, first served basis. Although jobs are immediately available, applications should be submitted far enough in advance to allow SOS ample time to obtain the necessary permits and papers. Interested students may obtain an application form, job listings and descriptions, and the SOS Handbook on earning a trip to Europe by sending their name, address, educational institution, and $1 (for addressing, handling, and air mail postage from Europe) to: Placement Officers, Student Overseas Services, 22 Ave. de la Liberte, Luxembourg — Europe.

Bergstresser's One-handed Catch Evens Juniata's Record At 3 wins — 3 losses

by Tony Martuzas

Very late in the fourth quarter, with first and ten on the Lycoming 40 yard line, Karl Bergstresser pulled in a Gary Shope aerial and was bumped out of bounds on the five yard line. A flag was thrown which brought the Indians all the way back to their own 45 yard line. At that point, I packed up and was leaving the Press Box. Before I exited, I thought I experienced a relapse as Karl looked over his shoulder, pulled in a pass and sprinted into the endzone. The Lycoming Warriors were beaten by one pass pattern which failed during the first try. All this happened with 55 seconds left in the game.

That was a great way to cap off a mediocre game, which was marked by eighteen punts, five lost fumbles, and five interceptions. It was a typical "sesaw" game.

The line did a better job this week. Opening up some good holes were Soph. Alex Zubritsky (McKees Rocks) and Soph. Sean Ryan (Hershey) were the guards while frosh Mike Hileman (Carlisle) and Soph. Steve Oak (Lancaster) played tackle. Anchoring the line was Junior Don Myers from Penn High School in Jeannette. When he wasn't downfield running patterns, Pete Lentini (Mt. Carmel) supplied blocking from his tight end position.

Carmen DeFrancesco led all Indian ballcarriers with 70 yards churned out by 19 carries. Gary Shope threw for 133 yards, completing 10 passes out of 21 attempts.

The Indians are now back at .500, with 3 wins (Delaware Valley, Susquehannah, and Lycoming) and 3 losses (Denison, Albright, and Westminister).

Next Saturday will be Parents Day and Grove City will be there trying to spoil it.

Favorable Future In Sight For Women's Field Hockey Team

by Vernne L. Wetzel

On Tuesday, October 17, the Juniata women's I.M. field hockey team travelled to the Grear School for a scrimmage. This marked the first event (besides practice) in a hopefully developing program for field hockey here at J.C., another of the many undertakings of the intermural staff.

Under the coaching of Joann Reilly, a total of 14 girls played in the scrimmage, including four girls who had never played in a game situation before. The players were Sherrie Allemang, Michelle Andre, Elaine Becker (rooke), Carmin Benalcazar (rookie), Sue Ann Bucher (rookie) Cathy Crouse, Diane Dawson, Faye Hess, Lillian Hollyday, Custy Kustanbauter, Ann Leach (rookie), Jacque Prentiss, Sue Rosshirt, and Vernne Wetzel. Other girls that practiced with the team were unable to make it to the scrimmage. In spite of the lack of experience and practice, the J.C. team played well as a unit and held Grear to one goal in the first half. Grear scored two quick goals in the second half to win the scrimmage by a score of 3-0.

Another scrimmage was played on campus with Huntingdon High yesterday, but the results were not available for this issue. As we gain experience, we will become a better team. More important than the immediate success of the team is the substantiation of a program for future years. This year is only the beginning; with continued organization, by the intramural office and participation by the students, it certainly won't be the end.

E-Town Nips JC Harriers

by Bill Robison

Despite their best individual times of the Cross Country season, the Juniata runners lost a close M.A.C. meet to Elizabethtown last Wednesday by a score of 27-28. In the cold and wet conditions on the Huntingdon course a matter of seconds decided the winner.

Charles Brown of E-twon finished first with a time of 25:58 for the 4.7 mile course. Jack McCullough of Juniata captured second place with a clocking of 26:16 but it was not enough as the E-town harriers took 3rd, 6th, 7th, and 10th. Juniata's other scorers were Steve Hooper (4th), Jim Bowen (5th), Doug Crosby (8th), and Dave Sims (9th).

Upcoming meets for the Juniata Cross Country team include: Shippensburg, Away, Oct. 25; Delaware Valley, Home, Oct. 28; Dickinson, Home, Oct. 30; and St. Francis, Home, Nov. 1. To date, the J.C. runners are 4-6 overall, and 2-1 against M.A.C. schools.

Parents Kept Busy During An Eventful Weekend At J.C.

This last weekend was designated Parent's Weekend. It is that special weekend on the calendar, when parents are invited, and even urged, to come and visit their sons and daughters and see the college.

There was plenty for them to do while they were here too. There was a production of "You're a good man, Charlie Brown" on Friday and Saturday nights.

On Saturday many parents ate lunch or dinner or both in the cafeteria. Many also attended the reception heeld in the ballroom.

Of course, the highlight of the weekend was the football game, where parents were treated to an impressive win.

All in all, it was a hectic, and sometimes overly formal weekend, and now that it's over Juniata can catch its breath and return to normal.

Mountain Day Is Welcomed Rest From Routine of Classes

by Sue Blum

There was a desolate atmosphere about the Juniata Campus on Thursday Oct. 26. No classes were held for it was the annual Fall Mountain Day held at Trough Creek State Park. Buses picked up the students in the front of Ellis Hall during the morning hours. Starting at one-thirty lunch was served by the Food Service in the park. Mmm was it ever good. There were spare ribs, hot dogs, potato salad, baked beans, big red juicy apples and even vanilla flavored popcicles. Heavy huh?

Then behold, a football game was taking place betwixt the faculty and seniors, and who else but our students could have won that rough and tough game? Students were then free to enjoy the day as they pleased whether it be by hiking, joining in the sports and games or by just rapping with friends.

Down by the dam there were many students engaged in a good old traditional game of Tug-of-War. First the male population of Juniata College displayed their strength, the seniors coming out on top. And who says females are weak? Our Frosh girls creamed the sophmores and our seniors creamed the juniors.

The last of the organized activities was an egg throwing contest. Anyone courageous enough along with their partner could join in. The winning couples received prizes donated by the Juniata Bookstore while the lossers received cracked eggs. After all, being covered with egg yolk can't be all that bad as long as you're having fun. That is until it drys up and gets a little crusty. All in all, Mountain Day turned out to be a big smash, ending at 4:30 in the afternoon.

Nixon Beats McGovern by 2 to 1 Margin In Juniata Student Poll

This being election time, pollsters are constantly working to measure the political feelings of the American public. Well, Juniata College has not been ignored. A couple of political science students took a poll of the campus and got some interesting results.

The students taking the poll sent out about 300 questionnaires in randomly selected mailboxes. They got back about half of them.

One of the questions concerned presidential preference. On this one, Juniata proved to be an exception to the rule that McGovern's main support is on the college campuses. Here, Mr. Nixon was the pick by a two to one margin. In a similar poll taken on Juniata's campus in 1968, Mr. Nixon had been the pick by better than a five to two margin.

There are other noteworthy political facets of Juniata students which were uncovered. About 80% are registered. Of these, about 15% are Republicans, 30% are Democrats, and 15% are independents. In the poll in 1968, although most students weren't old enough to register, the preference still went to the Republicans, who got over 50% of the students to prefer them, while about 20% preferred the Democrats, and about 25% said they would be independents.

The vast majority of Juniata students are basing their choice for President on the issues with economy and Vietnam being considered the most important issues. Both were named on agout 45% of the returned questionnaites, with the economy being named a couple more times than Vietnam. In 1968, Vietnam was the overwhelming choice, with the economy not even being mentioned.

When asked how well informed they were, about 40% said they were reasonably informed. Another 30% said they were well informed. About 15% said they were poorly informed. Only 10% thought they were very well informed, and only 5% thought they were very poorly informed. In comparison, over 45% were reasonably informed in 1968, with 25% being poorly informed.

When questioned on President Nixon's performance, about 50% thought he was doing an average job in his Economic Policy, while almost 60% thought he was doing a good job in foreign affairs.

In the final section of the questionnaires, the trend seemed to be to agree with Mr. Nixon's stands and disagree with Mr. McGovern's. This is interesting because the college campus is usually thought of as a stronghold of liberalism.

So these are the results of how Juniata students think in the field of politics. They should provide some interest in the last week before the election.

Evaluators Relay Findings To J.C. Administration

by Patrick Minnick

The facilities of Juniata College, both physical and human, were under the scrutiny of professional college watchers last week. A team of seven from the Middle State Accrediting Committee observed the school in action, interviewed students and professors, and finally told the Administration, members of the faculty, and student representatives what opinions of Juniata they had come to hold in the short time they were here. This oral report is the first step in the accrediting process. Next the team that visited this campus will write an evaluation which is to be sent to the main Accrediting Committee. This, along with the college's response to the written report will decide the final accreditation results.

Juniata's accreditation seems to Dean of Student Affairs and Dr. Norris. The evaluators apparently found that the majority of the functions of this school are being carried out in a totally acceptable manner. The Trustees and the Administration are dedicated in their work for Juniata, the faculty is generally competent and the student body "believes in civility as well as reason." Also the accreditation reporters said they saw a "belief in the future" here which is a contrast to the attitude on many campuses. The New Program also found favor with the investigators. Freshman Seminar and the Human Existence courses were praised for their approach and the way in which they are carried out.

Other aspects of the school are much less acceptable and in need of revision. The Health Service, which has also been under fire from Student Government, is in need of major improvement. Writing Program was criticized because it is not being taught by regular faculty members. The lighting system in the library is faulty and must be rebuilt. Other items of a similar nature must be taken care of if Juniata is to remain a quality college.

Charlie Brown Production Highlight of Parent's Weekend

by Ed Thomas

Parent's weekend was highlighted by the presentation of "You're a Good Man Charlie Brown" by the Department of Music and the Concert Choir. The play, directed by Bruce H. Hirsch and staged by Marjorie E. Hirsch, was based on the comic strip, "Peanuts" by Charles M. Schulz. It was essentially a series of segments from the comic strips strung together to represent "an average day in the life of Charlie Brown".

To say the performance was one of the best ever witnessed at Juniata would be an understatement. Each character was properly imitated by the six players. John Sommerville, Phil Woodworth, David Brombaugh, Judy Rosen, Debbie Holsinger and Frank Pote, played their parts perfectly. There was no one individual who stole the show. Teamwork was the most important element in the production's success.

Teamwork was not confined to the cast though. The instrumentalists and production staff combined with the players to produce one beautifully coordinated unit. This unity is what made "You're a Good Man Charlie Brown" the highlight of Parent's Weekend.

Great Rako Juggernaut

by Jack Troy

"I couldn't help reading your T-shirt. Is 'Raku on a Rock' a new Japanese drink?"

"Sorry, it's another trip . . . like, in a car, to Clarion State College."

So it goes at Juniata, where "Raku on a Rock" clothing may be seen from time to time. The photo-silk screen from which the stencil was made was custom-designed by Clarion State Professor William Groach especially for the occasion.

R.O.A.R. began as an effort to get the ceramic classes from two colleges together in a "classroom without walls" project. Everyone agreed that the 40' x 40' rock island in the Clarion River would be an ideal spot for the October project, and since it was fairly flat, could serve as the base for a temporary kiln, to be built, fired, and removed all in a day. The Juniata contingent was to provide a canoe for transportation from the mainland (the island is 20' offshore), and the hosts were to scare up the necessary brick and gas. It seemed like a fine chance to meet some new people, learn about raku (a method of firing pottery), spend a day outdoors, and all in a new landscape.

We left Juniata with our sleeping bags, bisque-fired pots, and a vague notion of what might go on. As it turned out, we were all pleasantly surprised. At about 10 A.M. the canoe ferry service was operating, carring pots, potters, brick, burners, and other paraphanalia including an eight-pound cheese, out to the rock. Mr. Grosch engineered a kiln unlike any we'd seen before, and within an hour it was glowing; ready for the first pots. In the meantime, glazing buckets and decorating supplies were being readied, and an easy cameraderie was developing between the two dozen or so people who were beginning to feel at home. After they had dried, the pots were placed into the 2,000° F. kiln with tongs. Fifteen minutes later, the glaze having melted, the pieces were removed, smoked in leaves, and quenched in the river with a flourish.

Lots could have gone wrong, but nothing did. Nothing! The canoe didn't tip over once; we didn't run out of gas, nor did the tank freeze up; the glazes melted and looked pretty nice; the cheese was excellent; rest room facilities were discovered; and when a power boat full of curiousity seekers approached warily, we invited them to check out the event as if we did the whole gig at a new spot each weekend. Later, they sped away, waving, admiring one of Doug Marschka's pots he had given them. The'll probably always think of us when they go by the rock.

As darkness fell and the last of nearly 150 pots were being fired, an acute sense of hunger began to pervade even the most intrepid, despite the cheese's having disappeared along with six loaves of French bread. The ferry service was pressed into action, and all remnants removed from the island. We then sped to a local restaurant, prepared to feast away, only to hear from the owner these unforgettable lines: "If you're looking for food, you're out of luck. We've only got a half a dozen hamburgers, and they've already been ordered." To our credit, no one uttered the ancient Japanese oath incurred by the Zen masters in times of stress: "Raku you!" but someone did softly

After supper we watched some excellent movies on Japanese ceramics, saw some slides of contemporary works in clay, and then devoured an assortment of freshly-baked goodies from Phyliis Groach's kitchen. The sleeping bags were rolled out in the house and studio, and sleep came easily for us all. Next morning, after breakfast at the Clarion Restaurant, which boasts a real waterfall right in the dining room, as well as murals of the local scenery, we set off for an hour's hike under the virgin towering pines at Cook State Forest. After a visit to potter Norma St. Germain's, we headed East towards the Baskin Robbins way-station in State College; thence on to Huntingdon. Come spring, we plan to host the Clarion group for a Huntingdon County version of Raku on a Rock. The classroom without walls obviously has some built-in advantages.

EDITORIAL

by Henry Siedaikowski

Elections are now less than a week away. Next Tuesday, American voters will go to the polls and pick their President for the next four years. After last week's announcement that a peace is forthcoming in Vietnam, the oddsmakers won't even touch this race.

However, with Mr. Nixon's re-election seemingly imminent, we are presented with a rare opportunity to study what the Presidency is worth to a man. To Mr. Nixon, it is worth quite a lot.

It is worth 20,000 American lives. Mr. Nixon made the same concessions he could have made four years ago, but it would not have been as politically profitable as a peace made just two weeks before the election. So Mr. Nixon traded those 20,000 dead, the four extra years of suffering by the POW's and all the injured and drug addicted for four more years in the White House.

Mr. Nixon is a far better politician than he is President. And the first duty of a politician is to get elected or reelected. Seeing this, Mr. Nixon quickly realized that the second term in office was worth more than those 20,000 dead. So he immediately began killing bills to aid education, build hospitals and stop pollution, so that if there was a need for a tax increase, a strong possibility in our rapidly inflating economy, he could immediately put the blame on the Democratic Congress.

This would seemingly be enough, but just to make sure, his reelection committee decided to risk the people's faith in the government, a risk which perhaps unfortunately materialized, and bug the Democratic National Headquarters so that they would know what the opposition was doing.

And to make sure he could finance his campaign, which would be an expensive enterprise with him trying to convince the common man that he was their best friend via the television, he kept his relations good with big business by consistently trading the common interest for corporate profit in such things as the wheat deal and the IT&T affair.

There were other little things too, but this formed the major part of Mr. Nixon's trade for four more years. It seems inevitable now, so all of those who are going to vote for Mr. Nixon, can do so with a clear conscience. But before you vote, just consider for a moment how much Richard Nixon paid for that vote.

Dep Club Stimulates Christian Actions

by Marlyn Hoover

"For God so loved the world. . .". It's the knowledge and experience of His love that gives us reason to rejoice and the desire to share it! Deputation Club is a group of concerned Christians who desire to share their faith and witness by conducting worship services in churches throughout Pennsylvania. Through these services the team hopes to stimulate Christian thought, growth, and action. Members of the club come from a wide variety of religious backgrounds, the common denominator being love of and service to the Lord.

The Deputation team now has a repertoire of five types of services. The conventional service is conventional only in terms of the order of worship. This type of service permits introduction of innovations into a worship experience that a pastor may be hesitant to try, and may instill an eagerness in the congregation to try more innovations in their services. New ways of worship are introduced to stimulate thoughts and enthusiasm leading to Christian growth and action.

The current multimedia production is entitled "As Little Children". The service combins several media: slides, music, poetry, scripture, tape recordings, in order to portray, in a dynamic way, children, what we can learn from them and what we ought to teach them.

A Workshop is an experience in which the congregation is actively involved in preparing and conducting a Sunday morning worship service. A Deputation team meets with interested members of the congregation on Saturday evening for planning and fellowship, the congregation then conducts the service Sunday morning. Through active participation and involvement the service becomes more meaningful and enthusiasm revitalized.

Other forms are worship through drama, a dramatic presentation in place of the regular order of worship, and a coffeehouse.

It is by sharing and expressing faith that faith becomes strong. These sharing experiences mutually uplift one another's faith in the Lord through fellowship in Christ.

THE BIG HOUSE

by Richard Mettler

Coming to the Kalos Clifton Theatre from November first through the fourth is a comedy double feature well worth $1.50. "Play It Again Sam" by Woody Allen and "Last of the Red Hot Lovers" by Neil Simon could actually both be subtitled as "Great Expectations". Both deal with a man who has long past his height of sexual potency at four o'clock P.M. during his nineteenth year. Both men experience horrendous misadventures before they come to terms with themselves which fit their personalities.

Woody Allen, (acting in his own film) while estranged from his wife, seems to be having great difficulty in reaching that bali hai with other women. The ghost of Humphrey Bogart becomes reincarnated via the foggy airport from "Casablanca" to offer humorous and somewhat less helpful interjections. Bogie's advice doesn't do much good as Woody experiences a new disaster with each new female prospect. He is even turned down by a nymphomaniac. How much trauma can the male ego withstand?

Woody begins to question his sexual potency. He begins to understand that he was not fulfilling his wife's desires. He could never offer her the kind of life that she would find with her motorcycle friends. To paraphrase Woody Allen, "It's not as though she went all through our marriage without an orgasm. Or did she fake it that time?"

While being himself, in between personations of the mannerisms of Bogart, he steals the heart of the female part of a married couple who both have long been his dear friends. This affair is incredibly brief as they both realize that she belongs with her husband. When her husband finds that she has been seeing someone else he suddenly realizes how he has been taking her for granted and a new love develops between the couple.

Woody and Bogie walk down the foggy runway after seeing the couple off. There's supposed to be a correlation here somehow. Bogart declares that Woody Allen no longer need his assistence. "You're on your own kid." The film results in the following: Woody Allen becomes a new man who finds that he can woo women by just being himself, a married couple finds renewed love and happiness, and Humphrey Bogart returns for a well deserved rest, back to the comparatively peaceful atmosphere of "Casablanca."

Alan Arken in Neil Simon's "Last of the Red Hot Lovers", portrays a middle aged owner of a sea food restaurant who has a reputable wife and grown rosey-cheeked children. While driving from his white American upper middle class home in New York Suburbia on the way to the city for work he begins to think about other women. In his complete entire life he has had but one extra-marital experience; in a New Jersey whorehouse when just a teenager. "Afterward I didn't touch anyone in my family for a week."

He arranges for three women to meet him at his mother's apartment while she is at work at the hospital. Virgil Thompson said that, "Gertrude Stein is the old feminist. She demanded all the rights of men and all the privileges of women. She had it both ways." Alan Arken's first guest possessed many of Stein's qualities as she seemed to be in complete control of the situation. She knew what she wanted, and had no qualms about going after it. Result: disaster. His second guest was a young Broadway aspirant who warned him that a friend of hers got busted for marijuana because he neglected to "flush the toilet twice." Result of this affair--disaster. His third strike came after a less than enjoyable bout with a married woman among his circle of friends. Result: disaster.

He finally realizes that he doesn't want extra-marital affairs. He just wants affairs. So he procedes to call his wife, "Don't ask questions, just meet me at my mother's apartment."

Judo Club Revived

by Jim Hunter

After being on sabbatical last year, this year Dr. Fisher has revived the judo club. The club, founded years ago by Dr. Fisher, offers judo as a means of self defense for everyone, unexperienced as well as experienced, females as well as males. This latest development is one of the novel items of this year's club, as compared to that of former years. Dr. Fisher, himself a black belt, 2nd degree, decided everyone should deserve a chance. Approximately 35 members first joined the club, but now only 20 attend the meetings regularly.

The club, which performs Kodakan judo, has Charlie Bates as the highest degree of all the members. Chuck Bates adorns a brown belt, 3rd degree, which is the highest degree he can achieve from Dr. Fisher. From here, he must achieve a higher rank by attending bigger competitions. Kodakan judo, named after the building in Japan where judo originated, differs from typical American judo. In kodakan judo, one begins with the white belt, then brown, and then is awarded a black belt only after completing much work in attaining the necessary skill. In the typical American judo clubs, different colors are awarded frequently to pacify the people paying money and needing to improve.

Carmen DeFrancesco (22) crashes through the Grove City line as the Indians manhandled the Wolverines in Saturday's game.

by Tony Martuzas

The Grove City Wolverines came to town last Saturday, giving up 407 total offense and 55 points to the Indians, while they scored only 6 and their runners managed to produce 38 hard fought yards (202 yards by passing however). You might say their biggest mistake was showing up.

Juniata came to play, on that foggy, overcast day. After a hard runback of the openning kickoff by Bruce Brooks, quarterback Gary Shope sent Mike McNeal and Lou Eckerl into the line. On Grove City's 44 yard line, Carmie DeFrancesco took a pitch and raced down the left sidelines and was finally caught 4 yards short which would have been his second touchdown of the year. Lou Eckerl banged over from the two, and scored. McNeal's PAT was good.

Later in the first quarter, Wolverine quarterback Bob Raferty looked downfield and fired a pass to his end Mark Kosick, only to have it picked off by cornerback Jim Messner. Messner picked up a convoy of blockers and ran 34 yards for the score. The frosh cornerback got carried away and jubilantly spiked the ball. Unfortunately, that's a fifteen yard penalty (on the ensuing kickoff).

The Wolverines took advantage of the penalty as they finally put together a drive. On the Indian 23 yard line, Linebacker Bob Waggoner and Middle Guard Jim Rescigno blew in and dumped Raferty for an eight yard loss. Defensive Tackle Tom Wynn recovered a fumble on the next play, which put a stop to that Grove City drive.

Early in the Second Quarter, a bad punt by Bob Umbarger went out on the Grove City 35 yard line. Nine plays later, Gary Shope, on the option, faked the pitch and took it in for the score. Juniata 21 Grove City 0.

On the Wolverine 29 yard line, quarterback Shope executing the play action pass, spotted his tight end Frank Wiley running downfield wide open. Shope connected for the score and McNeal connected for the conversion.

Grove City, unable to run on the tough Indian line of Cerny, Johnston, Rescigno, Wynn, and Herrman, was forced to go to the air. When that didn't work, punter Bob Umbarger was called back in.

On the Wolverine 33 yard line, Shope connected for another touchdown as Karl Bergstresser pulled the pass in, this time with two hands.

The Wolverines didn't give up at this point though, the first stringers were still in there. Anyway, Grove City made it to the Indian nine yard line. Tim Pell recovered his teammates fumble in the end-zone. Despite a violent Juniata protest, the Wolverines were awarded the score.

Now Coach Nadzak pulled his starters to give his reserves some game experience. Halfback Rich Nedimyer showed he could play as he went busting into the line. A screen to Carm DeFrancesco put the ball on the Wolverine 18. Quarterback Don Mastrorocco hit wide receiver Joe Lauver on the two yard line, but Joe spun and dove into the endzone. Score: Juniata 42, Grove City 6.

After Jeff Ziegler's interception (second), Bill Seibert grounded out four. New quarterback Jim Rossi found frosh Al Dunkleberger downfield and connected for the score. Frosh Dave Cortazzo did the kicking, and he was on target. Keith Colonna's 69 yard interception return, scored the last touchdown for the Indians (kick failed). Incidently, Juniata's last high scoring game was in 1968 against Haverford College, 58-6.

The Indian Defense were rougher than usual this week, Tom Wynn was smacking down passes, Larry Johnston and Jim Rescigno were crunching Grove City runners and passers, while Tom Herrman and Larry Cerny shut off the sweep. The Indian Offensive line looked strong, as Steve Oak, Alex Zubritsky, Don Myers, Sean Ryan, Mike Hileman, and Rick Hatch again did an outstanding job blocking. They have to do it again, for the next two games as they travel to Western Maryland. The Indians are 4-1 MAC (4-3 overall) and must win to stay in contention.

Crouch and Mr. J. Bowser, Scott Heberling and Dr. P. Heberling and Doug Clelan and Ed Podgorski.

The women's field hockey team played Huntingdon High School last Tuesday in what turnd out to be a good scrimmage. Huntingdon 1-0, which is indicative of a close contest. The Juniata players were Sherrie Allemang, Michele Andre, Elaine Becker, Sue Ann Buchner, Cathy Crouse, Diane Dawson, Carolyn Edwards, Faye Hess, Lillian Hollyday, Custy Kustenbauter, Ann Leach, Jacque Prentiss (game captain), Sue Rosshirt, and Vernne Wetzel. The tremendous improvement displayed after only one game is encouraging for the future, especially when it is noted that only two players were upperclassmen.

I think the people who participated in the fall intramural program will agree that it was a great success.

Wet Week Harms Juniata Thinclads

DELAWARE VALLEY

by Bill Robison

On Parent's Day, in the cold, wet, drizzle, the Juniata Cross Country team dropped another tight meet by a score of 28-30 to Delaware Valley. Tim Manning of D.V. led the Aggies to a 1,2,3, with a 26:08 clocking.

Juniata's thinclads managed 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th, and 8th, but the damage was already done with the D.V. sweep on top.

SHIPPENSBURG

by Bill Robison

In a spectacular performance, Jeff Halterman of Shippensburg State College, broke a course record by 30 seconds as the JC Cross Country team fell to another state school last Wednesday. Over the 5.6 mile course, the longest run by JC harriers this year, a 1, 2, 3 finish was recorded by Shippensburg in their 23-32 victory. Following were Fred Bare (2nd) and Randy Hummer (3rd), both over a minute behind Halterman's 29:25.

But Coach Swinderman was pleased with his JC runners' performance and he looks optimistically toward the M.A.C.'s at Drexel on November 3. The five Scorers for the Indians were: Jack McCullough (4th), Bill Kibler (5th), Steve Hooper (6th), Jim Bowen (7th), and Doug Crosby (10th).

DICKINSON

Five Juniata runners crossed the finish line at 27:28 en route to a 15-49 annihilation of Dickinson this past Monday. Juniata's winning quintet included Jim Bowen, Jack McCullough, Steve Hooper, Steve Gretz, and Bill Kibler. Doug Crosby (6th) and Larry Hoover (8th) added to the victory with displaced points. Dickinson's top Doug Olafsen, averted a complete shutout by taking 7th place by 1 second.

Bink Noll, Poet, Speaks on Life

by Mark Hochberg

Last Thursday night Boll, poet in residence at Beloit College, gave a reading of his work at Shoemaker Galleries. Mr. Noll is, in both his style and his choice of subject, a modest poet. He writes of the things and events which populate everyday life; his poetry speaks with a voice which is sane, sometimes moving, but never shrill.

To write this kind of modest poetry requires a fair degree of audacity. It is risky to depend solely on the sharpness of your with and the skill with which you can manipulate language. It is safer to have a profound subject to fall back on: life and death, "what is the answer, Gertrude?"; or at least a sufficiently intimate subject to have gossip value: your sex life or your emotional instability. And, if subject fails, you can always get louder. If you can't move your audience at least intimidate them with your own emotional transport.

I don't mean to belittle profundi-

Task Force on Governance Studies Important Problem on JC Campus

by Dave MacVeigh

Referring to the problem of governance that exists on the JC campus today, Dr. Wilfred Norris, Provost, said that the problem came up in the summer of 1970. According to Dr. Norris, the Task Force on Curriculum raised the problem.

The Task Force, which was then in the process of preparing the new curriculum, recommended that a Task Force on goverance be set up. "However," said Norris, "the implementation of the new curriculum during 1971-72 held it back. Last spring, though, the Board of Trustees appointed a committee to clarify the issues."

Dr. Norris gave an example of a governance problem. The overriding problem is the question, "How do certain decisions get made?" In this case, "Who makes up the dormitory regulations? Do they keep the student in mind? And so on."

As of now, there is no Task Force on governance. Norris says that there will be one organized if the committee appointed in the spring determines that a problem does indeed exist.

Dave Andrews, Student Government President, thinks that the best way to solve the problem of governance is to start with the Student Government itself. According to Andrews, SG has made a number of significant changes.

The major problem, as Andrews sees it, is that "The faculty, the administration, and the students are autonomous bodies with no means of communication."

Toward this end, SG had divided itself into four standing committees, and is now in the process of writing a new constitution which should be ready within the next few weeks. The four standing committees are: 1) Budget and Management; 2) Residential Life; 3) Instutional Research; 4) Student Concerns.

The Budget and Management committee's job will be to determine fiscal policy. The Residential Life committee, chaired by Rick Fornadel, is perhaps the most active committee at this time. Right now, the janitorial service in the dorms is being discussed. On Nov. 10, there will be a meeting at 4:30 with Floyd A. Roller, Business Manager, and A. Eugene Esterline, Superintendent of Buildings and Grounds, to discuss this problem. Students interested in having their views heard should contact either Andrews or Fornadel.

The Institutional Research committee is investigating to see if the College really attempts to get members of minority groups to come to JC, if scholarships are offered fairly, etc.

The Student Concerns committee, as Andrews said, is the "catch-all." It is now working to get an inter-campus telephone system installed. It has worked to have the lighting fixtures in the library repaired. It will be taking a survey of students enrolled in all the courses, asking not only for facts, but also for opinions of those in the courses. This was done last year, but Andrews hopes that the result this year will be better than before. A pamphlet containing the general opinions of each course will be published at the end of the year.

Student Government is working for improvement in student legal rights, says Andrews. With the cooperation of Dean Robinson, a joint judicial board of 5 women and 4 men has been organized. They hear all cases involving student infractions of the rules. Previously, a male would be tried by the Men's board and the female would be tried by the Women's board. This might be fair, except in the case of co-habitation. The joint board will help to insure equality.

Alex Bevin and Guitar Give Concert in Tote

by Ron Mowen

Alex Bevin, a talented musician and vocalist, appeared at Tote Saturday evening.Although Bevin started a little late (car trouble), his show was well worth waiting for. His show, composed mainly of nice, quiet originals, also contained favorites by Tom Rush, Bob Dylan, and Blind Willie McTell.

The first half of the show contained a little boogie music, such as "Jelly roll Baker", a little bluegrass and some heavy blues. The highlight of the first half was a tale about a fair maiden who was without a key to her chastity belt. Bevin ended the first half with a medley of tunes which exhibited his skill at guitar playing.

The second half of the show was mainly soft and quiet. Many songs he performed were originals such as "Libby's Song I", "Libby's Song II", and a song he calls "Highway Psychosis". A few other songs he did were "Shadow Dancer", "Baby Let Me Lay It On You", and "I'm Never Going Back to Nashville".

Alex Bevin is a very sensitive writer and says of himself, "Everything I have to say is in my songs." Bevin, a native of Cleveland, has cut one album and is currently working on another.

Saturday night at Tote was slightly disappointing; mainly because of the noise made by those who were there to talk rather than listen. However, Bevin performed very well despite this annoyance. If you were able to hear his songs you know he has a lot to say about life.

Temple U. Reps To Visit Juniata For Intern Plan

A representative of Temple University's Intern Teaching Program for College Graduates will be on the Juniata College campus on Thursday, November 9, from 1:30 to 4 p.m. to discuss the program and the possibilities of liberal arts graduates becoming secondary school teachers.

Grace Dick, supervisor of intern teachers at Temple, will be available in the Juniata College placement office to answer questions on teaching opportunities, explain who is eligible, and how the three-year program operates.

Now in its 18th year, the Intern Teaching Program for College Graduates combines full-time teaching in a junior or senior high school in Philadelphia or suburban areas of Pennsylvania and New Jersey with graduate study at Temple.

This year 75 interns have been placed in secondary schools within a 25-mile radius of Philadelphia, and some 1500 teachers have been placed since the program began. While a number of the participants have been graduates of liberal arts programs in colleges and universities within 200 miles of Philadelphia, student interns represent universities in some 40 states including Hawaii.

Applicants for admission to the program should have a degree from an approved college and have ma-

Dr. Kihl to Present Paper On Korean Reunification

by Henry Siedzikowski

This weekend, Dr. Young Kihl, of Juniata College's Political Science Department, will travel to Kalamazoo, Michigan to deliver a paper at the Fourth Conference on Korea, Institute of International and Area Studies, Western Michigan University.

The Conference, on November 10-11, will contain a series of papers dealing with North and South Korea. Dr. Kihl's paper will come at the end along with another paper delivered by a political scientist from Arizona State. The final part of the program deals with the relation between North and South Korea.

Dr. Kihl's paper is entitled, "North-South (Korea) Relations: Unification-". He was asked last April to prepare and deliver this paper. To do this, he made a trip to South Korea this past summer, to conduct field research. He interviewed government officials, intellectuals, and others in South Korea, and his paper is the result of that research.

The interest in this area was primarily generated by Mr. Nixon's new Asian policies, especially his trip to China, and the results they have had on the inter-national scene. Dr. Kihl's paper deals with this impact on North-South relations at some length.

The paper itself is divided into three parts. The first part is on the reaction of the North and South to the changing international political scene. The second part examines the interaction between North and South. The third part examines the prospects of unification.

On the subject of martial law which has been imposed in South Korea, Dr. Kihl expressed ambivalent feelings. He understands why it was imposed, but he sympathizes with the criticisms.

Frosh Give "Bald Soprano"; An Absurd Outlook on Life

by Alice Boomhower

The Freshman Seminar Group got off to a fantastic start with the Bald Soprano. The play was about the hum-drum of daily life, and the lack of intelligent conversation among people. Ionesco's play is considered to be a brilliant work in "the theater of the absurd," and the Frosh carried the mood off in fine style.

As the play opens, the Smiths are sitting in their very English living room, after finishing their very English dinner, and sipping their very English tea. Later, the Martins enter the very English living room and dully go through a hilarious love scene, in which Mr. and Mrs. Martin find each other to be their long-lost husband and wife. The Fire Chief then enters the scene to tell a few stories. A truly ridiculous one, "The Headcold," leaves the audience wondering about its own sanity. Finally, after many nonsense lines and a blackout, the Martins take the place of the Smiths from the beginning of the play.

The Frosh have been working on this play since the beginning of school in their seminar group, very capably headed by Mrs. Doris Goehring. The Smiths are played by Sam Sirianni and Elaine Becker, the Martins, by Phil Klippert and Lillian Hollyday, and Bill Christian as the Fire Chief, and Libby Kough as the Maid.

The play was performed by the group on Monday, October 30 at 8 p.m. in Oller Hall for the entire campus, and the following morning was presented to the freshman class as a lecture for Modes.

The Frosh will be working on other plays in the future and will be active for the next term in their seminar. After that it's on to bigger and better things, so LOOK OUT, Drama Department, THE FROSH ARE COMING!!!

Letters to the Editor

Letters to the editor should be addressed to: Editor, The Juniatian, Box 867, Juniata College, Huntingdon, Pa. 16652. The editors reserve the right to print only non-libelous and responsible content and to edit all letters and commentaries submitted to The Juniatan. The staff also reserves the right to publish all full signatures unless the writer can supply valid reason for omitting his name.

Dear Editor:

In your November 1, 1972 issue of the Juniatian you ask the rhetopical (that is asinine) question, "who else but our students could have won that rough and tough game?" This was in reference to the Mountain Day touch football conflict between the faculty and seniors. Some of us felt there must be an answer to this question, one founded not only in theory but in fact. Modesty forbids we tell you the exact answer, but anyone who saw the contest knows that at the end of the game the faculty was ahead by twelve points. The faculty scored two touchdowns. (The faculty has yet to be defeated since the inception of these games in 1958.)

Yours for honest reporting,
The Watergate Eleven

It must be nice to have callouses because then you don't feel very much. I suppose they come from rubbing on one spot too often or perhaps from having stuck oneself with a pin in the same place too many times. The truth of the matter is that people with callouses, say on their fingers, should not count grains of sand blindfolded (unless, of course, they use their tongues but, then, they will probably swallow much of the sand).

Saturday night I arrived, for lack of a better term, no doubt, at "the coffeehouse." I found that Juniata had managed to hire the talents and sensitivity and humor of a young man who plays guitar and sings songs of his own creation, with above average ability. Alex Bevan was on "stage" singing to us of the encounters and judgments he has experienced in his life. He is gentle but he speaks, he is fragile but strong but, he, especially as a musician, like most other human beings is sensitive. As he sang to us, in a mellow voice, clear but not extremely loud, I felt a deep sadness for him and with him but, his songs were not of sorrow, they were of joy within sorrow so, this is not the sadness.

I realize, as a performer and as a human being, that entertainment is a form of play for the audience, as well as the performer. However, there is sometimes artistry involved in entertainment, it is not all play. When a man is performing he is not always playing to make you happy. He is not always playing to provide music for dancing or clapping or drinking or screaming or even talking. He is sometimes just sharing and sharing must sometimes be done in silence. Two people cannot talk at once, for long, with complete understanding. Sometimes one has to be quiet while the other one speaks.

The whole point of this is people who go to concerts sometimes go to listen. Oh, there are concerts for dancing and clapping and screaming and even talking but, not Alex Bevan's. There are times and places for most everything but, one must be sensitive enough to judge this for oneself. Either Juniata is harvesting the insensitivity or it is just autumn everywhere. It is probably everywhere but, here is a good place to witness it in action.
Moral: The best time to talk at concerts is, usually, between songs.

Sincerely,
Carlos Alejandro

Lime

by Edward Kinchley Evans

I don't read the papers, I never listen to the radio, and seldom have an opportunity to watch television, so, when it comes to the news, I'm left to rely on hearsay and gossip. It's a delightful way to avoid having to make a decision founded on anything more substantial than personal prejudice. In a vegetable patch it's easy to vegetate. And ever so often some well meaning person brings along a load of manure to sweeten the soil.

I've heard vague rumblings about a review by the local critic of the local doily rag of the recent Juniata production of "Charlie Brown" and a whole foot full of toes stepped on. My own limited reaction to the performance was that it was as about as successful as those television attempts to capture the essence of "Peanuts". It can't be done, and to ever have Linus do a 'strip tease' with his blanket sums up the rather heavy handedness of not understanding your material.

But my experience so far has been that we live in a world so fabricated out of lies and half-truths that it is a dangerous gift to see too clearly. We protect our vanities like hidden sores and if the bandages become a little exposed, we pretend they are ribbons and laugh and laugh until we feel better.

Security has become a gray blanket we smother under until every ounce of integrity has drifted through our hourglass of being and has left our mind and heart robotomized to the status quo of passive existence.

We are surfeited with riches and are dying of Boredom. When the world was not so prosperous and the belly was hungry for food, it ate without question and with much relish and thanksgiving any dish that was set before it. Nowadays, if it isn't (and it usually isn't) made all pretty like with parsley and star-sprigged beets, we turn up our appetites and go somewhere finger-snappy for a greasy hamburger and some indigestible fried potatoes.

Now, we are so burdened with personal wealth that no child of ours has ever the opportunity to be hungry for education or knowledge. We force feed them our deserted dreams and ideals. Where there is no need to fight for survival, the feet take root and the mind begins it's downward journey into the glories of the past.

I sat through a half hour lecture this past week and thought, "My God, I will surely die before the alloted time is up and I can escape out into the fresh air!" The lecture was about the death of a young man who, like the Japanese samurai who has deserted his honor to save his life, goes about the unhappy process of self destruction with a mental dagger.

God gives us Great Days to explore daily, but we have to furnish the enthusiasm and if we sparkle and look alive, will we not help chase all the blues away (as Miss Ruth Etting used to advise)?

"Mock Election" by Frosh Choses President Nixon

Professor Nolan's political seminar conducted a poll of the students attending Juniata College. The poll included major issues and a presidential preference. The poll was held on Wednesday October 25, 1972.

The results of this poll have been recorded, but the issues of the poll have not, as yet, been analyzed or compared to each other. The results calculated by the seminar will be available, in the future, to anyone interested in them.

The overall turnout of the campus was a most commendable one. We, the members of the seminar would like to extend our thanks to all those, who viewed the election seriously, and to those of you took the time to vote and made our "mock election" a success, and a valid sample of the campus.

The quantity of the voters were best shown in the Freshman class. A grand total of 85% of the 1976 class gave their time to register a preference in the National Election.

The sophomore class was next, a total of 64% of the class voted on Wednesday.

The Junior class came through with 54% voting; the tail of the Juniata campus being held up by the Senior class, with a little over half of the class being represented, 52%.

It was very unfortunate, however, that many of the Faculty and Staff on the campus were unable to participate in the poll of the campus. It is only a hope, now, that this group will make a more reputable showing at the National Election, on November 7, 1972.

Eliminating the part-time teachers, the teachers listed on a sabatical leave, but including the Writing Program teachers a depressingly low statistic of only 23% was recorded as voting in the Seminar's election.

A deeper look at the collected data reveals the number of voters in our "mock election" who are registered to vote in the National Election.

Of the 302 Freshman voting, only 85 were not registered to vote. The reason for this may be that some are not old enough but by the same token there may also be a lack of initiative. Idealistically, we would prefer the former of these two to be true.

The class of '75 falls next in line. Only 19 of the 208 Sophomores were not registered to vote. I should again prefer to hope that the reason for not registering is other than a lack of initiative.

The Juniors followed with only 19 of their 143 classmates not being registered to vote in the election.

The class of '73, of those who graced us with their presence, had 13 of their total 115 not registered to vote.

It was in this area that the Faculty and Staff really came through, all 33 of them were actually registered to vote, in the Presidential Election.

The unclassified voters, those not wishing to claim their position, student, faculty or staff were shown as a 3 to 1 ratio, the three representing those not registered. The total number of unclassified voters was 4.

The real public value of this poll is the number of registered voters and their choices for the Presidential Office. This cross sample of the registered voters on the campus is ty or intimacy as fit subjects—after all, they are the stuff of great poetry, and they demand deep emotional involvement. But in the house of poetry there are many mansions, and Noll's poetic "House" is not to be dismissed because it isn't built over the abyss. When they don't work, as some of the occassional pieces he read first didn't, Noll's poems can be prosey and politely superficial, mere verse. But when they are as good as the selections from "The House," the poems spark with exciting images and bite with controlled irony.

Whether describing the joys of unpacking groceries or exploring the meanings of walls, these poems startle and delight with their fresh perceptions of daily life. They awaken the listener to the richness and complexity of his own mundane experiences; they transform the banal and quotidian into things fresh, and make the old world new. From Wordsworth to Wallace Stevens this has been a chief goal of poetry, and Bink Noll's achievement, for all of its modesty, is real and significant.

Ski Enthusiasts Go For Blue Knob

by Vernne L. Wetzel

—Good News for everyone—who wants to ski this year. The intramural office is currently planning a skiing program to begin January 8. Blue knob would be the place, Monday night would be the night (7-10 p.m.) and the initial program will run for 4 weeks. The best part of all is the college discount. For the first 4 weeks, the cost will be $28 total if you need to rent equipment (Blue Knob has all new equipment), or $16 if you have your own equipment. This includes $2 for lift ticket, $2 for lesson (required for the first 4 weeks) and then $3 for equipment rental, if needed. If you sign up, you must go the first 4 nights. After that, the fee would be $2 per night if you have your own equipment or $5 per night (including equipment); this is only for those who participated in the initial program.

The IM office would like a minimum of 30 students. In order to keep the cost down, car transportation would be ideal; a chartered bus would really raise the fees. The deadline to sign up is December 7. Before that, on November 30 there will be a ski show in the Ellis ballroom. At least half of your fee must be paid by December 7. Here is a tremendous opportunity to enjoy skiing, especially if you have never tried it before. You will probably never have this chance again. More information will be given out when details are worked out.

PAVE Center To Help Vets

Veterans in the Central Pennsylvania area have a new Program to Advance Veteran's Education (PA VE) center available to them at Juniata College.

The new center, operated by a pair of Juniata seniors, Walt Wall and Ben Brigaman, is located in the I. Harvey Brumbaugh House, room 203, on the Juniata campus, and veterans are encouraged to visit with their questions about furthering their educations.

Juniata's PAVE center is one of approximately 50 in existence under the Governor's Human Resources Services throughout the nation.

The purposes of the PAVE service are as follows: to enroll veterans in educational programs, both collegiate and vocational; to contact all recent veterans and inform them of the benefits available including the GI Bill, and other federal and state programs; to aid veterans now enrolled in educational programs with information on benefit increases or new programs; to aid in the process of applying for benefits or to follow up applications with the Veterans Administration and other state and local agencies.

Interested veterans may call the Juniata College PAVE center at (814) 643-4310, extension 46, to arrange an appointment.

HEAC Establishes Recycling Center at Juniata College

Most students have probably heard the announcements on WJC concerning the recycling center. We can still use more volunteers—if you wish to help with the recycling center, or any other environmental activities, contact Rex Morris through box 1635, or John Krouse through box 1077.

This article, though, concerns participation in the recycling program by students as consumers. In other words, Juniata students should be recycling their recyclable wastes.

The Huntingdon Environmental Action Committee can recycle probably at least a third of the solid wastes produced by students.

The following is a list of recyclable items that can be processed by the Recycling Center:

Newspapers—preferably bundled, but accepted unbundled. Magazines—glossy paper magazine only. Examples: Time, Life, Newsweek, Reader's Digest. Other magazines must be thrown away, so please don't bring them over. We prefer magazines bundled also.

Brown paper—this means corrugated cardboard boxes, and brown paper bags.

Glass—we accept clear, brown, and green glass. We cannot accept porcelain or ceramic articles. We cannot accept bottles with foil-faced labels—quart-sized disposable Pepsi bottles are an example. (We do not want plastic—labeled Pepsi bottles either). Bottles should be dlabeled, and any metal articles should be removed, but this is not an absolute requirement, either.

Metals—we accept any scrap metals.

Steel—tin cans: These are food cans. These can be easily flattened by removing both ends and stepping on them.

Combination cans: These are most soft-drink and beer cans. They have zip-tops and a seam (ridge) around the bottom. They have aluminum tops and steel bodies.

Aluminum: This includes soft drinks and beer cans with rounded bottoms. This also includes TV dinner trays, foil, frozen pie plates, antennas, lawn furniture frames, etc.

Any other scrap metals.

Any articles not covered above must be thrown away, as we cannot store them or recycle them.

The center is open all the time for deposition of materials. The center is located between the Pot Shop and the House beside it. The entrance is in the back.

All articles listed above are recycled into new articles. None are dumped.

A further note—we prefer that people use returnable bottles rather than disposable containers. Returning bottles is easier than bringing disposable items to a recycling center. Also, using such bottles is cheaper for the consumer.

Who The Hell's Playing Music?

Years ago when the first talkies came into the motion picture business, the early directors were skeptical about putting music, applause, or laughter in with the final audio. They felt that the audience would wonder where it came from and thus negate it's usefulness in controlling the mood of the audience.

But not too soon after the first talkie, some daring young knave of a director decided that canned noise would enhance the effectiveness of his film. Well, that original audience, most of whom are now dead, bought it and so we're stuck with it today as a result. Almost any cheap laugh serial or low-budget film will have those obnoxious sounds, in any combination. They tell us when to laugh, cry, show recognition, and become angry through the media of their hideous little noises.

Today, the caliber of films and audiences is much more sophisticated. The old cowboy and his faithful horse just doesn't make it any more with audiences who want to think as they view.

The films of today are much more diversified in kind and meaning. No longer does a film have to be happy or sad. Today, a film may cause one person to cry and another person to laugh ecstatically. People are now allowed to see films the way they want to. We are rapidly getting away from beating the audience over the head with canned affects to tell the audience how to feel.

More and more if we hear a piano we will see someone playing it. And if we hear laughter or crying we will see people either laughing or crying. In time, with a little luck, we'll stop hearing the New York Philiharmonic Orchestra during a street fight over drugs. I believe that certain sound effects are instrumental in some comedy and drama; but only to the extent where it helps the audience to use their own creativity in deciding for themselves what the film should mean. If music is used, then it should have something to do with the plot. Laughter and applause should never be used except in the rarest of circumstances.

If you are not sure as to what a certain film meant, maybe it's because you are not used to thinking for yourself without the assistance of canned noises. Don't blame the director of a film that leaves the audience on their own to think for themselves, for he has done so as a tribute to your intelligence.

what truly shows the preferences of the campus on a whole, their choice of the major candidates, Senator George McGovern or President Richard N. Nixon.

Of those 217 registered Freshman, 149 were in support of the G.O.P. candidate Richard N. Nixon. This leaves a minority of 55 for the Democratic candidate George McGovern. The remaining 13 feel that another (write in) man or in some cases no man is suited for the Executive Chief of Staff.

The sophomore class shows 111 registered voters are for President Nixon's re-election and that 53 voters are in favor of Senator George McGovern. This leaves a remaining 21 voters indifferent to the two candidates, and in some cases in support of another man or woman.

As for the Junior and the Senior class vote the apathy of the college becomes apparent and at the same time a hinderance to the statistical results obtained.

The Junior class forwarded a vote of 79 pro-Nixon and 36 for McGovern. This leaves a total of 9 independent or indifferent voters.

The class of '73 shows 69 in favor of the president and 40 who are in favor of new leadership, namely Senator George McGovern.

Computing the minute number of faculty and staff vote shows a direct opposite to the previously established student trends. The Nixon supporters rank 5 and the McGovern fans pull in 23, leaving only 5 members of this group feeling indifferent to, or re-channeling their support to other candidates, in the 1972 Presidential Election.

This shows an obvious difference between the faculty and staff when they are compared with the students of the Juniata College. The implication of this split or difference in opinion between the two shall be left up to the reader, but must be confirmed as existing by the data collected in this "mock election" poll of the college.

Professor Nolan's seminar, consisting of 13 Freshmen, would again like to thank all 818 of you who voted, including the 33 members of the faculty and staff, for your cooperation and time.

Indians Avenge Earlier Loss

by Bill Robison

Indian Harriers Avenge Earlier Loss

Last Wednesday the Juniata Cross Country team scored a 25-32 revenge victory over St. Francis College. The Indians, having lost their first meet of the year to St. Francis, turned the tables this time on their home course.

St. Francis's Rich Redman led the way with 25:56.4, but Juniata's Jack McCullough (2nd), Bill Kibler (3rd), and Steve Hooper (4th), followed in order to turn the tide of victory. Steve Gretz (6th), and Jim Bowen (8th) of Juniata also contributed to the winning effort.

Juniata's record is now 6-8 with Gettysburg the final opponent of the year meeting the Indians on their home course on November 8th.

Attention Juniatian Readers

Several questions have arisen of late concerning the nature and details of several programs and activities as listed in the Campus Crier of the Juniatian. Realizing that the space provided for this weekly calendar is limited, a few suggestions to those persons responsible for scheduling activities might help make the Campus Crier a bit more credulous.

When reserving rooms and scheduling activities, be precise as to the date of the program and the beginning time and if possible the time it will be over. Additionally, specify if the event is to be closed or open to the whole community. Include a brief description in the space provided on the reservation form of just what is to occur at the event. Finally, if you would like your activity to appear in the Juniata it must be scheduled at the Information Desk in Ellis Hall by 1:00 p.m. on Friday of the preceding week in which the meeting or activity occurs.

These few tips in scheduling will hopefully yeild a Campus Crier that is not only complete and accurate but also act as a vehicle to better inform the college community and help erase the apathy of so many.

by Tony Martuzas

The Juniata Indians now find themselves in the thick of the MAC Championship race. League leading (MAC, North) Albright is still in the lead, even though they lost last Saturday to Drexel 30-7 in a non-league bout. The Indians are tied with Wilkes, both with 4-1 MAC records. So the Indians must win, and the Lions have to lose to Upsala, if the Indians will share the MAC crown. If Wilkes win, there'll be a 3-way tie, since "Round Robin" won't be in effect until 1974. Round Robin is awarding Championships on basis of earlier Head-Head play, points scored, how many first downs, etc. This way one Champion will always be proclaimed.

Why talk about Championships? It just happens the "Green Terrors" of Western Maryland went down in defeat last Saturday, as they were clobbered 21-3 by the Indians. The Indians scored the first time they got their hands on the ball and drove down to the Green Terror 1 foot line, Lou Eckerl and Mike McNeal did the bulk of the running. Greg Kennedy, on the "36 Power", dived in for the score. And of course, McNeal's boot made it 7-0.

The game seesawed for a little while, but the tough Indian Defense stole the spotlight. Western Maryland advanced to the Juniata Four yard line. Four plays later, they advanced to the Three and were forced to give up the ball. Before the half ended, Norwegian-born Odd Haugen connected on a questionable 34-yard field goal. It looked like it was off just a bit, but the officials allowed it.

The Green Terrors were fired up after the second-half kickoff, as quarterback Gary Shope's pass was intercepted by the Western Maryland secondary. The Green Terrors made it all the way down to Juniata Five yard line, with first and goal. Four plays later, they were still on the Five yard line.

The Indian Offense took the sting out of the Western Maryland comeback, as they drove 95 yards in 12 plays. Lou Eckerl broke through the line and picked up 50 yards during that long drive. A little later, the Indians were on the six yard line. Shope, on kind of a bootleg, hit Karl Bergstresser who was "loafing" in the flats (Karl just stood still at the line, making it look like he wasn't in the play). Karl had to fight to get into the endzone and he was sandwiched by two Western Maryland defenders. Karl may miss this week's game at Moravian, because he sustained an injury on that play ("Hip Pointer"). Score: Juniata 14, Western Maryland 3.

Later in the third period, Tom Wynn forced a fumble and Larry Cerny recovered, which set up Lou Eckerl's plunge. Lou capped the drive, and Mike McNeal added the extra point. Final: Juniata 21, Western Maryland 3.

The Offensive Machinery of Juniata out-produced Western Maryland's — 280 total yards to 266. A NFL scout, scouting Western Maryland's Odd Haugen, was more impressed by Steve Oak, Sean Ryan, Don Myers, and Al Zubritsky, as they hit ferociously, opening up holes which enabled Indian runners to grind out 250 yards. On Defense, Dee Adcock played outstanding, and free safety Joe Coradetti is only one interception away from the school record of eight one season.

Next Saturday's game will be a good one, I suggest you should make this one (if you can get a ride). Moravian-Juniata games are always "Hard-Nosed" Football. The Indians lost to the Greyhounds in last year's meeting, 14-7. But, Juniata is a much better ballclub this year.

jored in English, history, social studies, mathematics, foreign languages, or science.

The program begins with a six-week summer orientation for which the student gets eight semester hours of graduate school credit. In the fall he receives an intern teaching certificate and is placed as a full-time teacher under the supervision of the ITPCG staff. A full teaching salary is paid by the employing school district.

Many interns require three years to complete the program; however, more than half of them find it is possible to complete their studies in two or two-and-a-half years.

Temple awards the intern a Master of Education degree on the successful completion of 30 hours of graduate study, two years of satisfactory performance as a classroom teacher and the passing of a comprehensive examination covering the graduate program.

"The ITPCG assumes that applicants should acquire a liberal education and depth in their subject matter in their undergraduate years," Dr. H. Bernard Miller, director of the program, said, "and professional training in teaching should be acquired under supervision while the teacher is on the job."

Within the last five years, more than 600 interns have been placed in schools in the Philadelphia area. In 1969 the program received the Excellence in Teacher Education Distinguished Achievement Award presented annually by the American Association of Colleges for Teacher Education.

Basketball Team Eyes Successful Season Ahead

by Chuck Rahauser

With the start of the 1972-1973 basketball season just around the corner, the Juniata Indian cagers are praticing hard in preparation for their initial contest on November 29th. Although last years team only graduated three members, Coach Swinderman anticipates a rebuilding year because of the abundance of good freshmen players. Last year was quite dismal for Juniata's basketball program; however, Swinderman feels confident that this team will flourish despite inexperience. The main concern of the basketball team now is how well and how fast the freshmen can adapt to college-type basketball.

The outstanding freshmen in whom Swinderman places great confidence included: Tim Taber (6'5"), Oscar Hatihett, Robbie Corlen, and Don Marin.

Along with the talented freshmen ball players, Coach Swinderman expects an outstanding contribution from a "healthy" Tom Rinaldi and Tom's roommate Alvin Grove. This is Al's first year in varsity competition at Juniata, but Swinderman has been gratified with Al's "shooting and ability to quarterback the squad on the court." Other returning players from last years team include Goy Ober, Mark Jula, Keith Black, and Kevin King.

Coach Swinderman cites Lycoming, Philadelphia Textile, and Albright as the teams to beat in important league games, and believes Juniata's performance will depend largely on the "players mental attitues." Presently, Swinderman is extremely pleased with his "hard working" squad and issues additional praise to the freshmen for "their good leadership qualities and ability."

Juniata opens their basketball campaign at home against Dickinson College on November 29th, and follows with Delaware Valley at home on December 2nd. So to Coach Swinderman and team, we wish you the best of luck for an enjoyable and successful season.

Modes of Thought Class Experiences Mutual Trust

by Sue Blum

Who am I and what are my values in life? This is the question the course of Modes of Thought and Methods of Inquiry is posing to all the freshman this year. A part of the total experience the freshman are going through in Modes was that of experiencing sightlessness and trust this weekend. Perhaps if you got a bang in the head by a meal tray at dinner or a glass of milk spilled on your new shirt you might have noticed what was going on. All the freshman were blindfolded from four to six hours each and guided by a partner. The blindfolded person was to be provided with a variety of experiences, unusual ones and common everyday ones, following through with the everyday routine that of eating and moving about familiar routes of the campus. The activities included were to stimulate the other senses by giving opportunities to hear, feel, taste and smell. The task might have looked a bit ridiculous and easy to onlookers but for the freshman who know, they found that this new way of experiencing and analyzing our environment was a challenge. It provided a source in which they could find out in a different perspective a new way of looking at themselves which is worth the price of spilt milk.

Center Bd. Presents Winter Activities

by Cindy Szczerba

Take note of the coming attractions presented by J.C.'s Center Board!

For a refreshing change "Gay Nineties Night" will be replaced by a "Barn Dance." Preferably this happening will take place after the Christmas holidays so all the gals can have time to whip up a skirt or outfit for the square dancing.

A Free-mini-concert, "The Big City Music Band" is scheduled for January 13. They played as a backup group in Shippensburg and made a big hit there. Another concert on the way before the Christmas holidays will feature "The Raspberries". The date is December 11.

In the sports line, winter skiing at Blue Knob will be offered at a group rate. The coffeehouse program will be continued, but a brand new addition is to be added. The old bookstore storeroom in the basement of Ellis Hall will be converted into a coffeehouse and mini-theater for use by small groups or presentations of film series or any other college organization in need of place to perform. This new development should be done by the spring.

Questionnaires Given For Thorough Evaluation Of Freshman Courses

by Henry Siedzikowski

We now approach the end of the first term of the second year of the new curriculum. There have been changes since its unveiling last year, but we are still working things out. So to expedite this process, a freshman seminar evaluation has just taken place.

Ms. Janet Lewis, of the Committee on Evaluation, has been organizing the efforts of a number of students and several faculty members in their efforts on this project.

To conduct this evaluation, a student visited each seminar during one of their regular meetings. Without any faculty members present, this evaluator passed out questionaires which the students filled out, and also discussed the Freshman Program with them.

The questionaire was a survey of the freshmen's feelings on all three courses which they take in the first ten weeks.

The questions themselves, covered a wide range of topics. There were questions on their enjoyment and participation in seminar. There were questions on how effective the Writing Program has been. There were also questions on whether they knew the procedure for testing out. A series of questions concerned Modes. The final question asked for how much time per average week, the student spent on each course.

The discussion part of the evaluation was intended for students to give direct feedback on the new curriculum, uninhibited by the presence of a faculty member. The freshmen were encouraged to give criticisms and suggestions.

All of the results will be tabulated and used by the Committee on Evaluation, in their efforts to improve the new curriculum.

Street Scene Performance Received Well At Juniata

by Ron Mowen

On November 12 and 13, Oller Hall was the scene of a fine stage performance. The J.C. acting class staged "Street Scene", a Pulitzer Prize winning play by Elmer Rice.

"Street Scene", composed of three acts, centers around a run-down apartment building in New York City and its occupants. All three acts take place on the doorsteps of the building.

"Street Scene" is not just another play about two lovers. It is a play in which issues such as race, religion, politics, revolution, and intermarriage are raised. It deals with social issues of the past and present.

The entire cast did a fine job of acting. However, there are those that receive special recognition. Steve Crowley, Cricket Smith, Dave Bombaugh, Peggy Smeal, Karen Crawford, and Tom Wynn performed exceptionally well. Also, Doris Goehring, director of "Street Scene", showed her prefessional skill.

Many hours of work went into this production. The entire production staff and cast is to be commended for a fine performance.

As an amazed crowd looks on, Mrs. Maurrant (Karen Crawford) is carried off-stage after being shot by her irrate husband.

The story of "Street Scene" revolves around a lover's scandal. Mrs. Maurrant (Karen Crawford), has acquired a lover on the side, played by Lennie Brooks. Nosey neighbors, Peggy Smeal, Lynn Huenecke, and Hazel Crouch all throw subtle hints to Mr. Maurrant, played by Tom Wynn. Mr. Maurrant catches a few of the hints. He finds the two lovers together and murders them.

The Student Government will be conducting a course evaluation of courses being taught this term during Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday of this week. It is hoped that both students and faculty will cooperate in this project to improve Juniata's academic program.

The Juniatian wishes its readers A Happy Thanksgiving!

S.G. Sponsers S - - Info. Service

This year men's and women's house in coordination with student government has sponsored The Sex Information Service. This service is presently working on a series of lectures which will be named Human Sexual Symposium. Thus far The Service has planned two lectures which will be held on December 7 and 12 at 8:15 in Alumni Hall.

The lecture on December 7 is entitled Human Sexualy. The December 12 lecture will deal with Birth Control and Abortion. These lectures are to be informative and will not be used to judge anyone's morals. Following each lecture there will be a question and answer period. This will enable all to get involved.

The Sex Information Service is headed by Barbara Kulenich and Sam Sirianni, each serving as co-chairmen. Dean Gabriel serves as acting advisor.

Both men's and women's houses and student government have agreed to finance a birth control handbook. This handbook will be distributed to all R.A.'s and will be posted around campus for student use.

Some future lectures will hopefully discuss V.D. and other problems dealing with sex.

NOTICE

Juniatian Readers

"The Juniatian" will not be published on November 22, November 29, and December 6, 1972, in keeping with stated staff policy which allows for the discontinuance of publishing during vacation and examination periods.

The next "Juniatian", Volume XLVIV, No. 9, will appear on December 13, 1972.

Juniata Catalog Features Change In Old Format

by Dave MacVeigh

Barnard C. Taylor, College Editor and Director of Publications, feels that this year's Catalog represents a major change from the catalogs of previous years.

"The physical appearance is new," says Taylor, "from page formats, new typography, (type of print,) etc. to the general layout."

To have a modern and economical page format, the large top and bottom margins have been made smaller, and the outside margins have been made larger. The cover has a contemporary look instead of a traditional one.

In the area of general layout, this year's catalog is a change from

those of former years. "Everything that has nothing to do with education has been moved to the back," says Taylor. A list of courses, a brief history of the College, a section entitled "Campus Life," etc. are in the front of the book, and the list of faculty members, campus map, etc., are in the "Directory."

Taylor believes that the Catalog is "essentially not a promotional piece," although for obvious reasons, the Admissions office uses it as such. Rather, he thinks "It is basically a contract between the Administration and the students."

"The purpose of a catalog should be to reflect a good school," says Taylor, "not a luxury in itself." He said the catalog is produced very economically by photo-typesetting.

Admissions Dept. Forms Student-to-Student Plan

by Henry Siedzikowski

The Admissions Department of Juniata College, in their efforts to reach more students and attract them to Juniata College, has devised a "student-to-student plan." Their idea is to make present Juniata students, who are satisfied with the college, ambassadors to their former high schools.

Right now, the Admissions Department is inviting any students who feel they might be interested to stop in their office in the basement of Founders. They will explain the program to you, and if you want to participate, they will give you catalogs and other information.

The program is set so that students can take the information back with them over Thanksgiving and Christmas vacation. Students can help by either getting this information to their friends in high school who might be interested in Juniata or by getting the information to the guidance counselor in their

I decided to enter the Soap Box Derby again this year, as I did last year. I obtained a set of the rules as required. Right off, I noticed that though a date and time was set for inspection of the vehicles, nothing on the sheet made any mention of the place and time for the race itself. Furthermore, no one at the information desk had any information on the subject. I was further disgruntled to notice that once again, the prize money had been lowered. Two years ago, first prize was $100. Last year, it was cut to $75, and this year down to $50. I believe the above mentioned facts combined to virtually eliminate creative response to the activity this year.

To continue, someone finally stated that the derby trials would take place at 11:00 Sunday on Oneida Street, the races being set for 1:00. Previously not being able to find the inspection, I did show up for the trials. I found myself to be the only one present. Then, I was informed at the information desk that the location had been changed – to Washington Street. No one was on Washington Street, either. Finally at noon on Sunday, we discovered when and where the races were finally scheduled. (No one else seemed to know before this, either.)

Well, as the situation turned out, only five entries turned out. Three of the entries were the ones that had been run previously. Another was one that had been used previously, with modification made. Only one was made this year.

To add insult to injury, or maybe injury to insult, two of these should not have qualified by the rules, but were permitted to run. Even worse, they were both the previous first place winners from the first two years.

Why didn't they qualify? Hawbaker's only had three functional wheels, with a fourth non-functional wheel. The wheels placement did not resemble the placement of automobile wheel, either. English's vehicle was simply two bicycles welded together. The rules require that only the wheels and axles could be pre-fabricated.

So, that was the situation. (Incidentally, I could see a similarity to other Center Board efforts of this year. The electrical equipment from the Seatrain concert STILL has not been taken from the gym.)

I sincerely hope that such efforts can improve soon. I further hope that this year's Derby will be a useful guideline, rather than a deterrent to another Derby next year.

John Knouse

Dear Sir:

Where do we go from here? The election is over and President Nixon has done more than just defeat Senator McGovern. He totally wiped him out.

Of course everyone should have known it. The polls had been saying it for months. But somehow here was that ray of hope that a miracle would occur and McGovern would emerge victorious. It was hard to accept the inevitable truth that at eight-thirty, one half hour after the polls closed, the entire nation knew that Nixon had won 277 electoral votes and there was no end in sight as to the number that he would finally acquire. Thoughts of "If I had just worked a little harder, just given a bit more money", were lost in the avalanche of paper ballots, and statistics of the election returns.

And now with the volunteers returning home, McGovern going on a well deserved vacation and the reports of total reorganization of the Democratic Party, I feel lost, hopelessly alone in my desire not to accept the truth.

Nixon, for four more years. Can all those dreams of a new United States, of new national priorities, of equality for everyone and honesty in the White House be put aside for one moment to congratulate the winner and stand behind the man that will lead us for four more years?

The New York Times could and the NBC news reports that it is not the end of the world for the defeated candidate or the nation.

It just seems that way.

Juniata Sponsors "Four For B'way"

by Jim Hunter

Tomorrow, as part of the Focus Series, Juniata College is sponsoring "Four for Broadway", a highly successful musical production by Franklin Concerts. The production is tomorrow at 8:00 P.M. in Oller Hall. Focus Series tickets are still available at the information desk in Ellis Hall.

Reha London, who staged "Four for Broadway", promised songs from "My Fair Lady", "Kiss Me Kate", "On a Clear Day", "Kismet", "Mame", "The King and I", "Fiddler on the Roof", and "The Music Man" to be in the show. Michael Stains provides musical accompaniment, while the singers feature an impressive cast. Soprano Linda Bunkhart has appeared extensively on the east coast, working with leading stage directors Henny Butler and Sarah Caldwell. THE BIG HOUSE

The Fuhrer Bunker and "No No Nanette"
by Rich Mettler

The next year or so will be seen with a remarkable resurgence of interest in Adolf Hitler and the Third Reich in general. In 1968 Zero Mostel starred as an impresario Broadway director perpetrating a farce called Springtime for Hitler in which tribute is given to Hitler and the Thousand Year Reich. Much to Mostel's misfortune the musical becomes a hilarious comedy.

It now seems as though Hitler's springtime has indeed arrived. Sir Alec Guiness complete with toothbrush mustache and special black hair piece is starring in Hitler—The Last Ten Days. Guiness has studied Hitler's mannerisms through films and has even interviewed a survivor of the last days in Hitler's bunker.

"Hitler was almost senile at the age of 56: he was 70. He took pep pills and at times would have fits. At other times he would bet the giggles. I try to convey that comic side."

Guiness's script was written by Italian Screenwriter—Director Enno de Concini, Maria Pia Fusco, and Austrian Producer Wolfgang Reinhardt, son of famed director Max Reinhardt. De Concini persuaded Guiness to take the part by saying he saw the last ten days like "floating into nowhere in a first class jumbo jet. You go into unreality, between life and death—der Fuhrer crying, Eva Braun dancing to "Tea for Two", and the Nazi empire falling into destruction.

Virtually the entire film is set around the Fuhrerbunker. A few friends drop by in the persons of Braun, Martin Bormann, Joseph Goebels, and Alfred Jodl. Guiness is striving for a balance between evil and humanity. He finds it impossible to portray Hitler as a fiend all the time. "I try to indicate a certain sympathy—the sympathy I have for a childish murderer like Macbeth."

Peter Sellers is working on a comedy about the return of Hitler which is scheduled to go into production next year. The comic strip hero, The Phantom, brings the ninety year old Hitler, (Peter Sellers), back from the jungles of South America and brings him to justice. The climax of the film occurs when Hitler appears at London's Royal Albert Hall.

Another film scheduled is based on Inside the Third Reich, the autobiography by Albert Speer, Hitler's chief architect. There are at least eight other Hitler books which have been published so far this year in the U.S. and British television has released three major reports about the Nazi era. Carl Foreman is adding details here and there in his 26-installment BBC series on Hitler.

The main cause of this resurgence of interest in Hitler is time. The Nazi era is now very remote, especially to the younger generation. Also there now exists a great fascination with violence and banality of evil. This resurgence is probably good. I can think of no better way to guard against fascist intolerance than by becoming aware of what it's all about.

31 JC Seniors Are Student Teaching In Nearby Areas

by Debra Frazier

Thirty-one Juniata College seniors are currently serving as student teachers at six high schools, one junior high, and one middle school in the Huntingdon-Blair County area.

According to Thomas W. Woodrow, Assistant Professor of Education at Juniata, who along with Dr. Howard H. Crouch, Professor of Education, supervises the program, "student teaching is the culminative program of studies in the education department at Juniata. It is a field experience where the student takes on the responsibility of teaching under a closely supervised format. The student is in the classroom for eight weeks during which time he has the responsibility of planning and executing lessons. He practices teaching methodology in the light of sound educational principles and is especially encouraged to employ creative teaching methods which go beyond the traditional. Along these lines, the student teachers use self-made motion pictures and film strips, and encourage creative expression by the pupils demonstrating their (the pupils') skills."

The future teachers learn and practice methods whereby the students that they teach can "experience" material instead of just learning it. By so doing, the JC student finds that in preparing to teach a subject he gains a greater insight and understanding of his own discipline.

Working closely with the student teachers are cooperating teachers from each of the schools. This teacher is experienced in the student's field of concentration.

Participating in the student teaching program at Altoona Area High School are: Ed Quinter, Nazareth, German, (cooperating teacher: Miss Ann Temple); Cynthia Sprenkle, Lansdale, Spanish, (Miss Rose Lardieri); Mrs. Hope Lindsay, Huntingdon, Spanish, (Mrs. Charlotte McMullen); Gary Hartcan, Ephrata, Chemistry, (Mr. Steve Dolak); and Joseph Sollenberger, East Freedom, Chemistry, (Mr. Richard Andrews).

Bellwood-Antis High School has four student teachers: Ruth Norton, Wallingford, social studies, (Mrs. Grace Woomer); Randy Ruddek, South Fork, social studies, (Mrs. Ruth Ross); David Hawbaker, Mercersburg, German, (Mr. George Guyer; and Dorothy Cotton, Collingswood, N.J., English, (Miss Marjorie Campbell).

There are five Juniata student teachers at Central High School, Martinsburg: Karen Jones, Ridgewood, N.J., Spanish, (Miss Jane Diebert and Mrs. Avilia Herryman); David Harrison, Vineland, N.J., math, (Mr. Duane Guisler); Vivian Good, Zullinger, math, (Mr. James Marlett); Mrs. Janice Thompson, Huntingdon, English, (Mr. Michael DeSteffano); and John Entriken, Huntingdon, social studies, (Mr. Richard Metzler).

Also working with five student teachers is the Huntingdon Area High School. The Juniata student teaching there are: Patricia Manners, Emporium, biology, (Mr. Patrick Frazier); Susan Hockenberry, Clayton, N.J., math, (Mr. Robert Fultz); Garnice Popp, Johnstown, math, (Mr. Gary Nolan); Diane Bates, West Chester, social studies, (Mr. Richard Hudy); and Jeffrey Ziegler, Mifflintown, social studies, (Mr. Cecil Jackson).

Two student teachers have been assigned to the Huntingdon Area Middle School: Mrs. Nancy Conley, Huntingdon, English, (Mrs. Joan Largent); and Donna Bauey, Lewistown, social studies, (Mr. William Cousins).

Traveling to Mount Union High School every school day are: Kelly Crain, Tyrone, math, (Mr. William Shives); Mrs. Nancy Hartley, Lewistown social studies, (Mr. Leo Kumpf); Robert Leidy, Huntingdon, chemistry, (Mr. Arthur Shutawie); Christine Tomlinson, Langhorne, chemistry, (Mr. Arthur Shutawie); and Vicki Harris, West Caldwell, N.J., English, (Mrs. Evelyn East).

Bonnie Rosewarne of Pottstown is teaching German and Louise Shuman of Waynesboro is teaching math at Roosevelt Junior High School, Altoona.

Their cooperating teachers are, respectively, Mr. John Myers and Mr. Kim Sherry.

Three JC seniors are student teaching at Tyrone Area High School: Joe Coradetti, Arendtsville, (Mrs. Mary Angelo); Caroline Novinski, Hooversville, Spanish, (Mrs. Mary Angelo); and Dwin Bohn, Wilmington, Del., math, (Mr. Gordon Norris).

B.C.A. Day to Feature Exhibits

by John N. Mitchell

At registration on Wednesday, November 29, 1972 students are urged to express their interests in studying abroad. There will be a table provided in the Ballroom of Ellis Hall where several faculty and students will be present to answer questions and to note students' interest for studying in a foreign country. Students will also be asked general information to see how interest in studying abroad compares among various majors and classes. Efforts are being made by the committee to attract students in diversified fields of concentration.

The committee will also sponsor "BCA Day" on Friday, December 8, 1972 from 9:00 A.M. - 6:00 P.M in the Ballroom of Ellis Hall. At this time all students are cordially invited to come to the Ballroom and see some exhibits and souvenirs of foreign culture which were brought back by last year's BCA students. These former BCA students as well as several faculty members will be on hand to answer questions of any interested student. Coffee and cookies will also be served during the course of the day.

former high school and possibly help in talking to students in the high school who might be interested in Juniata.

There are several reasons why the Admissions Department is putting this program into effect. First, is the obvious reason that representatives from the Admissions Department could not possibly get to all the schools that can be reached if they used students as ambassadors. Physically, they are greatly restricted as to the number of schools they can visit, and the number of students they can reach. If a large number of students are willing to participate in this program, this range will greatly increase.

Another reason, is the increased credibility of a student talking to other students instead of a guidance counselor or an admissions director doing the talking.

They feel prospective students will tend to believe a student more, and also, they will feel more free to ask questions, especially about things that might be of great concern to a student, but they just feel an admissions director or a guidance counselor wouldn't know or wouldn't care about the answer.

So the intent of the program is to get information to potential students who might not normally consider Juniata. When the first direct contact is made, the Admissions Office will get their name and contact them further.

So if you are happy with Juniata as your choice of college, and you think there are others in your former high school, who might feel the same way, stop by the Admissions Office. Your help will be appreciated.

Our team has two home meets coming up in December. The opener on Dec. 2 against powerful St. Francis and Dec. 5 against another strong newcomer, Moravian, so why not get out and support these hard working men? This season could very well be a great one for Juniata College wrestling.

Ed. Note: Steve will be traveling with the team to all meets this year to give us badly needed coverage on our wrestling team.

Attention Juniatian Readers

Several questions have arisen of late concerning the nature and details of several programs and activities as listed in the Campus Crier of the Juniatian. Realizing that the space provided for this weekly calendar is limited, a few suggestions to those persons responsible for scheduling activities might help make the Campus Crier a bit more credulous.

When reserving rooms and scheduling activities, be precise as to the date of the program and the beginning time and if possible the time it will be over. Additionally, specify if the event is to be closed or open to the whole community. Include a brief description in the space provided on the reservation form of just what is to occur at the event. Finally, if you would like your activity to appear in the Juniata it must be scheduled at the Information Desk in Ellis Hall by 1:00 p.m. on Friday of the preceding week in which the meeting or activity occurs.

These few tips in scheduling will hopefully yeild a Campus Crier that is not only complete and accurate but also act as a vehicle to better inform the college community and help erase the apathy of so many.

fense produced 109 points (36 per game average). League leading Albright played Juniata at an opportune time, and hindered their Championship drive.

There's only one graduation loss for the Offense, Karl Bergstresser, the team's Split end. Gary Shope, Mike McNeal, Lou Eckedl, Carmie DeFrancesco, Greg Kennedy, Bruce Brooks, Rick Nedimyer, and frosh Rick Rudolph will be back for next year.

On Defense, Joe Coradetti, Dee Adcock, Bob Waggoner, and Jeff Ziegler have picked off their last passes. I know of a couple of MAC quarterbacks who will be glad that Tom Wynn, and Tom Herrman will no longer be playing. Back for next year will be Keith Colonna, frosh Jim Rescigno, Jim Messner, Steve Lehman, and Barry Hartley. Larry Cerny will still be at D.E. and Ed Halemen will be filling for the graduating Herman.

Juniata can't do any worse than second place, since Wilkes was knocked out by Delaware Valley. Upsala, although not a powerhouse team, just might edge out Albright. Lycoming, MAC cellar-dwellers, beat a tough Western Maryland team, 31-0. In the MAC, anything can happen.

Seven Lettermen Anchor Juniata Wrestling Team

by Steve Peoples

Juniata's wrestling squad reported for physicals and workouts starting two weeks ago. With a couple football players coming off their fall season and now working out with the grapplers, Coach Bill Berrier is getting his squad ready for their opening meet on December 2 with St. Francis here at home.

Coach Berrier feels that this year's team has more potential than any of those in the past and the season should be highlighted with some outstanding individual performances. The team's performance will be put to a stern test this season as Juniata has picked some new opponents, strong wrestling schools, such as Shippensburg and York. Coach Berrier feels that if the team can stay away from injuries, as last year's squad was plagued with their share of injuries, this season can be a good one.

The team is doing a few new things this year in preparation for the season. Coach Berrier has the squad working out regularly on weights and is stressing conditioning even more than in the past.

This year, collegiate wrestling will have a new innovation. By mutual agreement, between the teams at a meet, the order in which the weight classes wrestle can be changed. So don't be surprised this year if the heavyweight comes out to wrestle first. Any order of the line-up can be used if both coaches agree to it.

The only senior on the squad this year is Jim McCartney. Jim, coming off a great season last year, will captain this year's squad and as usual will be one of the strongest points in the line-up. Coach Berrier states that he has some depth in the upper weight classes and looks for the line-up to be stronger over-all than other years, counting on seven returning lettermen to lead the way. They are Jim McCartney, Mark Brown, Myron Zimmerman, John Soldenridge, Geoff Clarke, Keith Jones and Steve Oak. The line-up for this year is tentatively as follows:

Mark Salisbury
Paul Danner
126
Jim McCartney 134
Mark Brown
142
Myron Zimmerman
150
John Soldenridge
158

JC Harriers Take Sixth Place in MAC

by Bill Robinson

J.C. Harriers Take 6th in M.A.C

The Indian Cross Country team captured a commendable 6th place in the annual M.A.C. meet on November 6, 1972. Belmont Plateau, Philadelphia was the scene of the 21 team competition hosted by Drexel University.

Steve Luber of Swarthmore was the top runner with a record breaking time of 26:51, breaking last year's record of 27:09. Luber also paced Swarthmore to a team victory as 137 runners participated.

Steve Gretz finished first for Juniata in 38th place with a 29:31 clocking. The other Juniata runners were: Jack McCullough (41st), Doug Crosby (46th), Bill Kibler (47th), Steve Hooper (50th), James Bowen (52nd) and Dave Simes (94th).

Gettysburg Shuts out JC Thinclads

Perhaps the J.C. harriers were suffering a season ending let down as the Bullet runners ended the 1972 Juniata Cross Country schedule with a 15-50 shutout against the Indians last Wednesday. Gettysburg took the first seven positions with Shane Gerber leading the pack with a 25:57 clocking over the wet and cool Huntingdon course.

Juniata's finishers were: Steve Hooper (8th), Jack McCullough (9th), Bill Kibler (10th), Steve Gretz (11th), and Jim Bowen (12th). The loss gave the Indians a 6-9 record overall and 3-3 against M.A.C schools.

Looking back over the season, Coach Jack Swinderman said he was pleased with the performance of his young team and was sorry that they didn't have Brian Maurer to help them through the tough schedule. Finishing 6th in the M.A.C. tournament was an accomplishment considering there were 21 schools represented and Coach Swinderman looks optimistically towards next year. Also, Coach Swinderman expressed his deepest gratitude for Dr. Mitchell's assistance with the coaching duties during the course of the season.

Moravian Massacred In Juniata Indians' Finale

by Tony Martuzas

Wilkes College is no longer in the MAC race. The Colonels bowed to the Aggies of Delaware Valley, 20-18. Albright beat Lebanon Valley 33-7 in a non-league bout. Upsala lost to Fordham 22-6. It's now up to Upsala to keep Juniiata in the MAC race. Upsala must beat Albright 5-0) if the Indians are to be co-champs. If not, the Indians at least turned around last year's 3-4-2 record to a respectable 6-3 (5-1 MAC).

by Jeff Porterfield

Jim Rossi (7) lets loose with a pass as Steve Oak (64) and Bob Stannard (38) put up blocking in Juniata's crushing attack against Moravian.

The Indians closed out the season by trampling the Moravian Greyhounds 34-3 in a muddy field under a steady rain. Early in the first quarter on the Juniata 46 yard line, Gary Shope executing the option, started breaking loose and headed for the goal line. He was held up by a Moravian defender, but left guard Al Zubritsky wiped out the lone Greyhound defender with a fantastic block, springing Shope for a 54 yard touchdown. McNeal's PAT was good — Juniata 7 Moravian 0.

Early in the second quarter, a little ceremony held up the game as Greyhound quarterback Gary Martel broke Moravian's record for total offense, 1,134 yards. Mr. Martel paid heavily for every yard he gained curtesy of an Indian Defense that allowed only one touchdown in their last eighteen quarters of play. Moravian's only score came on their record breaking drive by a 34 yard field goal.

The Indians were forced to punt on the ensuing set of downs, but Moravian's punt returned Mike Zambelli fumbled and Sean Ryan recovered on the Greyhound 45. With 1-10, 45 yards out, Gary Shope hit Lou Eckerl with a short pass and Lou circled around looking for a block. With a crowd of four Greyhound defenders converging on Eckerl, Peter Lentini slammed into the crowd, springing Lou.

The Indians got on the scoreboard again as Mike McNeal crashed through the middle of the line to score from 54 yards out. There was a little mixup on the extra-point attempt. Score Juniata 20 Moravian 3. Also before the half, Senior defensive back Joe Copadetti broke the school's record of interceptions (one season) with his ninth of the year.

Early in the third quarter, Pete Lentini caught a Shope pass and was lasooned four yards out of the endzone. After Mike McNeal journeyed into the middle of the line for two plays, Greg Kennedy plunged into the endzone for the score.

The Greyhounds were unable to move the ball and were forced to punt to the Indians. Grey Kennedy on a swing pass (escort provided by Rick Hatch) rambled to the 28 yard line of Moravian. Mike McNeal again crashed into the line and found himself in the endzone a couple seconds later. Pete Lentini again assisted on this score, Final: Juniata 34 Moravian 3.

It's a shame the Offensive Line composed of Steve Oak (Soph), Al Zubritsky (Soph), Don Myers (Jr), Sean Ryan (Soph), and Soph Rick Hatch (also frosh Mike Hileman) took awhile to mold into a unit. In their last three games, the Of-

Student Gov't Opposes State Anti-Abortion Bill

by Patrick Minnick

"I can't see how any state legislature would pass a bill that would forbid abortions in the cases of rape and incest," says Juniata Student Government President Dave Andrews

Student Government took part in a bit of state politics at the beginning of this term after the Pennsylvania House of Representatives and Senate passed the controversial anti-abortion House Bill 800 on November 22. This bill bans all abortions "unless continued pregnancy might result in the woman's death". Even in this instance she must have the testimony of three doctors saying that her life is in danger. Governor Shapp, with his veto power, was, at this point, the only person who could keep this bill from becoming law and he was scheduled to make his decision on the veto on November 29.

In response to the governor's upcoming decision, Student Government called an emergency session on the evening of Tuesday, November 28, the day before Juniata registration. Our senators voted nearly unanimously to oppose the bill and to contact Governor Shapp and inform him of our support for a veto of the measure. S.G. President Dave Andrews then called the Governor's office on the morning of the 29th to express Juniata's opinion. To guarantee that Pennsylvania's chief executive got the message, a Western Union telegram and a letter were also sent to Harrisburg.

As things turned out, governor Shapp did not make the decision until Thursday November 30, at which time he vetoed the bill. The legislature then tried to override his veto but could not get the necessary two-thirds support for the bill. Since the legislature closed for the Christmas recess on December 1, the bill is dead until the next session when it will probably be introduced again.

The bill's sponsor, Representative Martin Mullen has, in response to the veto, stated that he will run for Governor and "bring morality back to Pennsylvania." Morality therefore, is the question. Mullen feels that abortion in almost any form is immoral. Student Government, the legislators who opposed the bill, and most importantly, Governor Shapp, feel that mothers who have been raped, who have venereal disease, or who will in any way have a predictably defective child, should have the option of an abortion.

Summer Jobs Offered by Gov't.

The Office of Career Planning has recently received the Summer Employment Announcement from the United States Civil Service Commission

A number of copies of the brochure that explains procedures applying for a summer job with U.S. Government are available at the Office of Career Planning in 208 Founders. The brochure explains eligibility requirements for various summer civil service jobs.

The announcement provides that outstanding students who will have completed at least two years of college by the start of the summer and who have a cumulative grade point average of 3.5 or above need not take the written test for Group I positions.

Students who have taken the written test or updated their previous year's eligibility and received an eligible notice of rating for 1972 summer employment are not required to take the test to be eligible for employment consideration this year. However they may take the test to improve their score if they desire.

The test will be given monthly from January to March 1973. The last possible date for application to be tested is January 26. Any interested students should visit the Office of Career Planning as soon as possible.

Foreign Studies Committee Attends Conference in Phila.

by Henry Siedzikowski

On Friday, December 1, the Ad Hoc Committee for Foreign Study Abroad traveled to Philadelphia to attend a workshop on Foreign Study Abroad. The Conference and workshop was attended by people from all over the world.

The committee members are Mrs. Marie-Jose Fassiotto, Mr. Pierre Wegimont, Dr. Irene Engle, Dr. Fritjers, Jeanne Elliott, Cynthia Sprenkle, Karen Jones, John Mitchell, Mrs. Irene Rodriguez-Barbera. The committee is concerned with promoting the study abroad program.

The conference, according to John Mitchell, was basically an "informative workshop", with lectures and discussions by prominent people in the field of foreign study abroad.

At the beginning of the conference, everyone registered giving his name and address. Mr. Mitchell said this was so they could all be sent literature on the Study Abroad programs later on.

One of the first workshops was conducted by two women from CIEE, that is the Council on International Educational Exchange. One concerned herself with the nonacademic portion of their programs, such as working and traveling abroad. The other concerned herself with the academic portion.

One of the highlights of the conference was a talk by Lilly Von Klemperer, the most noted person in the field of Foreign Study Abroad. Her talk was concerned with how a student could pick a good Study Abroad program from the numerous ones available.

Another highlight was a talk by Mrs. Ann Samual Robertson who has studied in 35 different schools in 17 different countries. She speaks several languages fluently.

After returning to Juniata, the members of the committee are now concerned with further promoting Study Abroad Programs on our campus. One of their first steps was sponsoring the BCA day last week. According to Mr. Mitchell, they will continue to promote the Foreign Study Abroad programs all year.

Crime, Evaluation, Elections Discussed by Student Gov't.

by Patrick Minnick

Student government is pretty busy these days with course evaluations, senatorial elections, and crime on campus. Crime at Juniata? Yes, unfortunately. When the cigarette machines were installed in East House and the Tussey-Terrace lounge at the direction of Student Government last Tuesday December 5, someone or some group of people, the culprits are still at large), decided to make off with the nicotine (300 dollars worth!) from the machine in East Houses. The machine was destroyed the evening of the day it was installed, so no money was taken because the machine had not been used by the students to any extent. Because of the act, no new machine will be placed in the East Houses.

Course evaluations are now taking place because Student Government feels the faculty hasn't been evaluated thoroughly enough in the past. A new system is in use in which students will and have been asked to fill out forms on their opinions of their professors in the last weeks of each term. This information will be fed into a computer and a picture of the student opinions of each professor and every course will emerge. This method has been proven to be successful and it is hoped that it will also work well at Juniata.

Just as in the past, the students who fill in the questionaires for evaluations will remain anonymous. The results of the evaluations will be published and a copy will be made available to each student at no charge.

Chairman of the evaluations committee is Ed Smith and he has the assistance of the following students in the long and laborous task of compilation: Alan Schell, John Poshywak, Linda Fidler, Don Stone, Chuck Barr, Jim Gerek, Elaine Becker, Roger Koon, Julie Williams, Barb Bailey, Francy Wright, and Bob Dellinger.

Leading a large measure of assistance from the faculty is Ms. Jones, Professor of Sociology, who has work in course evaluations before, having used this method both as a faculty member and a student. She is responsible for bringing this method of evaluation to Juniata, since she is familiar with the mechanics and operation of it. Another person giving aid in the work is William R. Alexander, Director of Institutional Research. Also other faculty members have lent a hand from time to time, giving the committee and Ms. Jones the benefit of their knowledge and insights.

One vote made the difference in the recent Senatorial elections. Jeff Putt, one of eight candidates, beat Steve Sachs by the slimmest possible margin for the Student Government post on Monday December 4. Other Juniors running for the office were Faith Shoemaker, Don Stone, Chris James, Chas Albright, Jeff Berkin, and Jim Pye. The special elections were called because of the resignation of former Student Senator Matt Musho.

SVS Reaches Out To Help Those In Community

At the beginning of this year student government president Dave Andrews asked some students to begin a volunteer service organization at Juniata. It was hoped that in addition to providing the community with needed manpower, the service would forge links of positive feelings between the college and the community, and also give students an opportunity to gain experience that is vital to an education. Well, those responsible for getting this thing underway didn't know where the hell to begin. But after several months of groping along dark, winding paths of community service agencies, Student Volunteer Services is standing on its wobbly feet. SVS has faltered often—unfulfilled obligations, inefficiency, etc. However it has made some measurable positive contributions to the community of Huntingdon.

Juniata students are helping with the following: Head Start; Community Center; Extended Care reading groups at Crawford apart- Unit at the hospital; children's ments; 4-H clubs; Child Welfare Agency. SVS plans to assist a day care center soon to be opened in Huntingdon, and hopes to expand an existing Big Brother and Sister program.

Anyone who would like to get involved or who was initially involved and perhaps was lost in the administrative jumble should contact 312 Lesher, box 1055, or call 643-9927.

Hochberg Lectures About Works of Flannery O'Connor

by Michael Kamins

On Thursday evening, December 7, the lecture series sponsored by the English Department continued with the presentation of The Art of Flannery O'Connor by Mark Hochberg. The manner in which one might convey "a fundamentally religious vision to a secular audience" Hochberg claimed, was the outstanding problem confronted by Miss O'Connor in her tragically brief career as novelist and short-story writer. This remark is not solely applicable to the fiction of Miss O'Connor, but seems apposite to the plight of the vast majority of authors practicing in this century. All modern writers do not restrict themselves to the rather limited religious approach of O'Connor, but they still can no longer suppose that the once sacrosanct values which unified them with their audience have remained extant. This obviously creates difficulty in determining which experiences are significant or worth recording. I am quite sure that Richardson's 18th century audience responded with thundering approval when Pamela resisted the salacious advances of her employer and eventually won the abortive seducer as her partner for life. The modern novelist instead of depending upon society's approbation makes personal value judgments upon the significance of various events and thus is frequently faced with the problem of proving to the reader that his conceptions possess validity. This particular difficulty reflects itself in the modern novelist's meticulous devotion to the creation of a system of values operative within the framework of his fiction, rather than remaining dependent upon a no longer shared value structure. Miss O'Connor, as Dr. Hochberg demonstrated, responded with technical virtuosity to this acute problem.

Miss O'Connor communicates her evangelical message by the forceful "juxtaposition of the violent and religious" to accentuate the importance of the sacramental experience: These epiphanies function as the manifestation of the divine element in quotidian reality. Dr. Hochberg

by Richard Mettler

"if The Godfather had been cast with lugs and directed by remote control it would have looked a lot like The Valachi Papers." This was how Time Magazine summed up The Valachi Papers directed by Terrance Young with screenplay Stephen Geller. The book of the same name by Peter Maas largely dealt with the McClellan Committee of 1963 in which lower echelon Joe Valachi gave the general public its first view into the intracacies of the Cosa Nostra. However, it becomes doubtful if the movie really was based on the book with characters that could have been drawn by Chester Gould and a plot which resembles Dick Tracy's Crimestoppers Textbook.

Director Terrance Young committed a few anachronisms such as allowing a 1971 Lincoln Continental to be included in a scene. But leave us not be too harsh with Terrance for he is not without past fame. As a matter of fact he alone was in charge of the complete choreography of Bananza.

Barely housebroken Charles Bronson starred as Joe Valachi. The Valachi Papers was filmed almost entirely in Rome and is in English. This is a bad break for us but will most certainly propitiate U.S. relations with non-English speaking countries.

The plot takes the form of a gangster geneology that names names such as Genovese, Anastasia, Profaci, Luciano. But the film actually has less connection with the underworld of the last four decades than a good Edward G. Robinson film on the back lot of Warner Brothers. In a typical Robinson role as thug number one Joseph Wiseman, a usually reliable actor, has consented to accept the role of Salvatore Maranzano with an accent which is pure Transylvanian. Maranzano divides the gangs all over the country into families and then stands back and collects the profits. He too is eventually killed by an enterprising rival.

Many tortures, beatings, and murders occur throughout the film but The Valachi PaPers reserves the worst of its devious practices for the audience.

cited numerous examples in attempting to explicate this process, perhaps the most impressive was his explanation of "the Artificial Nigger", included withiin the short collection entitled A Good Man Is Hard to Find. The plastic statue seems to embody the degradation, privation, and travail suffered by his unfortunate race. More importantly, to Miss O'Connor, the experiences of the "artificial nigger" represent a contemporizing of the Christ myth. Just viewing this buffered figure destroys all the self-righteousness of her charactor. They feel that they too are in need of the rejuvenascent powers of divine grace. The destruction of complacency is a theme to which Miss O'Connor devotes considerable energy pernicious of all vices, because it precludes the operation of divine grace and the fostering of what she considers to be a truly Christian consciousness.

Dr. Hochberg was not particularly concerned with the veracity of Miss O'Connor's rather extravagent religious convictions, but as the title of his lecture intimates, the manner in which she conveyed these conceptions. His talk was most impressive both in presentation and relention. He reviewed her major beliefs by choosing judiciously among her fictional compositions and essays. Hochberg explained how she represented her beliefs in the novels and stories demonstrating beyond disputation her technical virtuosity as well as her ideational vacuity. My only criticism of Hochberg's impressive performance is that the lecture was confined to one very brief hour.

Recently, while captured in a capsule of time, waiting, that insidious residue of our space era, I nervously searched around the efficient "customer service room" for some escape from having to concern myself with private thoughts or self-examination and found neatly piled up on a plastic table an assortment of our contribution to world illusion, the monthly magazines.

I fished through the titles until I discovered on the cover of the most bilious, the name of an author I recognized, Truman Capote. Comforted by the memory of having enjoyed his early work and firm in the belief that same degree of charm must still be in evidence, I folded myself up in a sheet of molded formica and turned to his article.

His style was still there like the remembered taste of castor oil in orange juice and he was relating an anecdote concerning the great French novelist Colette.

After the publication of his first novel "Other Voices, Other Rooms" (a trifle derivative of Djuana Barns' "Nightwood" but he can be excused because of extreme youth), Truman went to France and an interview was arranged for him by Jean Cocteau with Colette.

She was propped up in bed looking like some huge painted Dresden doll with mischievous eyes. On either side of her bed were tables holding her collection of rare and exquisite paperweights made between 1940 and 1880, the golden years of that art.

Capote was fascinated by them and when the interview was over, Colette chose a particularly beautiful one and gave it to him.

When he protested that he couldnot accept as a present something that she so clearly adored, Colette laughed and then with a searching look into his eyes said, "My dear, really there is no point in giving a gift unless one also treasures it oneself."

Which brings us to Christmas.

McDonald Reads Poetry At Cornell

J. G. McDonald, a Juniata College student, gave a reading of his poetry Monday night November 13 at Cornell University. Sharing the platform with Gary F. French, a Cornell Master of Fine Arts candidate, McDonald read ten of his most recent works to a crowd of over fifty people.

The reading took place at The Commons, a Cornell campus coffee house. The reading was attended by A. R. Ammons, poet in residence at Cornell and considered by most critics as one of the finest poets writing in America today.

McDonald described his writing as an "attempt to infuse meaning into the unique but still common events of life" by "exposing one's feelings to the point of vunerability." He read "The Exquisite Tenderness of Adopting a Grandmother, Rebel Style," a poem describing a visit with his wife's grandmother, "The Tiger Express," a poem about a trip to an amputee clinic with his father and "Bill's Place: Jaffery, N.H., Summer, 1968," a poem contrasting the roar of a motorcycle ride and the stillness of a woodland twilight.

McDonald is a transfer student in his first year at Juniata College. He resides with his wife, Molly, at 211 Fifth Ave., Juniata, in Altoona.

Sammy Buo Bids A Fond Farewell To Juniata College

by Sammy Kum Buo

By the time you read this, I will be in New York city preparing for a trans-Atlantic journey that will be taking me to what will have to be the greatest homecoming in my life to date. In other words, I will be preparing to return to my country after three years at Juniata College.

Before I left the campus on December 5th, some friends requested that I use my rather poor English to write a final article for the JUNIATIAN, and poor me with no writing experience, I was afraid to embark on such an important feat. Nevertheless, I finally mustered up enough courage to try writing a final good-bye piece for a campus that has been my home away from home for three years, a campus in which I grew up, and a campus which has paved the way for whatever exciting career that I may pick up along the way.

As I said in 1969 in these same pages of the JUNIATIAN, I am very pleased that I came to Juniata College, and I am sure that if I had to do it over again, I would come back to the same good old JC. This may not be the best community for a foreigner to make a tangible evaluation of these United States, but I strongly feel that when the time comes for me to deal with America on some international problems involving our two countries, I will be well equipped for the task, having lived and studied with Americans for three years. I came here a tender seventeen-year-old with little or no experience and a wrong impression of your country, but I am leaving with the kind of experience and the maturity that no twenty-year-old could ever complain about. I hope that I now know the real America and the real Americans, and I thank you all for aiding me in this learning process. Everyone on campus was useful to me because while I never made this clear, I was studying people more than I was studying political science (sorry Dr. Kihl!) because I will be dealing with people like you some day, somewhere and in some capacity.

I received a well-rounded education at Juniata, although I feel that there is still room for more educational innovations especially those that would utilize the students to expand Juniata's academic horizon. We are living in a world in which words such as internationalism and the United Nations have become household words, and so Juniata should catch up with other schools in internationalizing its campus and its academic programs. I suggested the idea of a student exchange involving Juniata and the University of Cameroon, and my country's Ambassador who visited Juniata in October has indicated his wholehearted support for such a program. It may not materialize in a day, but if I get home and can find some spare moments, I intend to pursue the issue with my country's educational authorities. I am sure of the positive contribution such a program would have both for you Americans and for my African friends because you would all get an opportunity to see first-hand as I did, the REAL nature of the two societies which the news media has played such a tragic role in misrepresenting.

It is impossible for any visitor to America to leave without commenting on the tragic Black-white race problem in America. As a Black African from a background void of any kind of discrimination because of racial differences, I was appalled at the sad and unfortunate as well as deplorable racial situation in your country. People have asked me if I have ever experienced any discrimination directed at me because I am Black. I always say that as long as there is discrimination against others because they happen to be Black, red, yellow, brown or white, I as a human being who has no time for bigots would also feel the pinch of the problem. I challenge anyone, who feels that he is better than me because of his racial background, to any test that is capable of proving the validity of such an absurdity. I feel that one can be proud of one's racial, ethnic or cultural background without letting this create hatred for others with different experiences. We Africans have an inborn pride that has never interferred with our ability to relate to others who happen to be different, and in several cases such as Rhodesia and South Africa, our disregard of racism as a way of life has been to our own disadvantage. We let Europeans into our continent and because we were not racist, they took advantage of our humanism to build up racist empires for themselves and their kin. That's the past and there are no more hard feelings.

What about the race situation in Juniata? It is, to say the least, pitiful. I personally overheard some students several times in their rooms using racial epithets to describe certain Black American students on campus, and it was these very students that would carry themselves around campus as practising liberals. I have nothing but contempt for such people and I have said it may times and will say it again, I do not care about discrimination in America because it does not have any effect on me; I have a country where I am king too! The socio-economic background of most of the students at Juniata is such that many of them have perhaps never seen Blacks before, and all they know about Blacks is what they read in the newspapers and see on TV, and that is usually violence. Violence is not to be equated with Black as many racist conservatives have tried to assert, and I felt that many Juniata students had this same attitude. They were afraid that the Blacks would take their women. I do not know why racists always lay so much stress on Blacks taking their women, but I saw this on the Juniata campus when a group of boys followed a Black student on campus who took a white girl to his room. They stood on a high elevation and watched what this interracial couple was doing in their closed room. This is so childish and so stupid that I felt sorry for these guardians of white women. I am sure they would have given me a big prize for not having dated a white girl throughout my three-year stay in Juniata. It may be disappointing to them to know my reason for not dating on this campus. It had nothing to do with race; nothing whatsoever! In fact one of the girls who occupies a very high position in my romantic mind is white and I would never care one bit about it. Too bad I am already committed to an African! I wish we could all love each other and live together in peace and harmony in a world that has had more than its own share of problems.

You would find out among other things that not only do we not look alike anyway, we are actually more different than we are alike. I

It Won't Happen Again Frosh !

by Terry Tomassetti

The registration for the second term with its disastrous effects on the freshmen has fortunately not gone unnoticed by the Registrar and Academic Standards Committee. Being responsible for registration procedures, they have realized the inadequacies of the present system which forced students, especially freshmen, to select courses like a Christmas Eve shopper selects gifts. After the big rush there was nothing left that they wanted. Having recognized these problems, the Registrar and ASC are currently devising a new registration policy which will provide equal registration opportunities for all students.

Blue Knob Open For Ski Freaks

by Sue Blum

Monday nights won't be so boring anymore around the Juniata campus for those students who signed up for the ski retreats to Blue Knob. Busses will leave at around 5:20 out in front of Ellis Hall for the ski resort starting on January the 8th.

Monday night December 4th representative ski instructors presented the proposed ski program offered to Juniata students in the Ellis Hall Ballroom at 7:30. A movie was shown displaying some interesting ski techniques and those who attended learned that skiing was first practiced 5,000 years ago. Blue Knob is ready for anyone—advanced and beginners. The goal is to get at least 60 students to join in, so that the slopes are reserved for us Juniatians alone.

The cost of the adventure will be $28 for four trips to Blue Knob, including ski rentals and lessons. For those with their own skis, the cost will be only $16. So for many, the winter season will bring on some exciting times and hopefully everyone will come out the same way they went in, minus a few broken legs.

Arts Council Formed to Encourage Artistic and Cultural Activities in County

Provost Wilfred G. Norris has been appointed by President John N. Stauffer to represent Juniata College in the establishment of a county-wide arts council. The objectives of the new organization, an outgrowth of the Huntingdon Arts League of which Dr. Howard H. Crouch is president, are to encourage and promote artistic and cultural activities as one means of making Huntingdon County a more stimulating place to live. Barnard C. Taylor, college editor, helped to set in motion an eleven member organizing committee whose plans for the council were unveiled at a recent meeting in the Faculty Lounge of Ellis Hall.

The arts council is to be a non-profit corporation. The membership will include all other non-profit organizations engaged in cultural activities of community or area-wide interest, individuals interested in fostering the objectives of the council, and supporting members. The first two categories will have voting privileges and the last category, consisting of business organizations will maintain a supportive role.

The chairman of the organizing committee is David G. Kunz, Kunz Printing Company executive. Other members include Mayor M. H. DeForrest; Donald G. Everhart, Reeves-Parvin Co. president; William E. Swigart, Jr., insurance executive; Marshall J. Showalter, Penn-Central National Bank president; James Lodge, county planning director; Mrs. C. Jewett Henry; Mrs. Richard Linton; Mrs. Warren Yocum, Jr., and Mr. Lynn Streightiff, Daily News reporter.

Norris and Lodge are co-chairmen of the long-range planning committee of the council and Taylor is heading publicity and promotion.

Lodge told the meeting in Ellis Hall that the council is more interested in people than in specific activities and "we hope to provide all of the residents of the county with an opportunity for a diversity of artistic and cultural experience and expression."

It was also explained that the council will establish working committees charged with the task of implementing the purposes of the charter. Volunteers will be invited to support the council by joining in the work of one of the committees. Among the first of these, in addition to membership and fund raising, will be a committee to explore the feasibility of an arts center with accommodations for a theatre, art classes, meeting room, sales and display area and an office. The committee chairman is Donald Everhart.

Other suggestions to be studied by committees include an arts festival or a summer arts workshop, a traveling museum and/or theatre, county wide exhibits, crafts outlets and a survey of art in Huntingdon County. It is planned to encourage classes for adults and children in areas now covered.

Anyone interested in the purposes of the organization may discuss membership with Mrs. Faye Yocum, 234 Penn Street, Huntingdon, telephone 643-0244.

Econ. Classes Visit Industry In New Program

Dr. Ronald L. Cherry, Dana professor of economics, and William D. Nichol, instructor in economics at Juniata College, have added a new dimension to the Elementary Case Studies in Business course which they teach on the freshman level.

Cherry has arranged for the class of 40 students to visit businesses and corporations in the central Pennsylvania area to witness sound, or unsound as the case may be, business principles in action.

Cherry describes the purpose of the visits in the following manner. "The field trips are designed to provide concrete examples of business problems discussed in class. In addition, they will also assist the student to increase his ability to critically observe a process and to focus his attention on its elements."

The Elementary Case Studies in Business operates on three levels—an introduction to a broad overview of the firm; the field trips which bring to life the textbook problems; and the development of the student's awareness of group roles and the dynamics of group interaction.

The Human Interaction Lab on the campus will be used in the group interaction portion of the course.

The class visited Standard Steel Corporation in Lewistown on Wednesday and has plans to travel to the Puritans Sportswear Company in Duncansville, Sylvania in Altoona, Sam Ray Car Shops in Altoona and the Sears Warehouse in Altoona, in the ensuing weeks.

don't blame you for this because for almost two years I found it extremely difficult to differentiate between several individuals on campus. . . .everyone seemed to be alike. . .I did not know who was Sue, Nancy, Jeanne, Jean, Steve, Paul, John, Milton or whatever. Now I know better and if I one day see Jeanne or Steve in Africa or in New York, I would walk up to them and say with absolute confidence "Hi Jeanne" or "Hi Steve." I remember this one student at Juniata who kept coming up to me asking about Africa. He had real problems trying to visualize the continent and to him Africa was the most exotic place in the world. I could understand his problem because I had the same experience in Africa trying to visualize America and never being able to. Our continent has gone through some major changes, but I would like to say that the best part of the metamorphosis is yet to come with the African youth and I hope to be part of the excitement.

Before I left Juniata, a friend of mine asked me very serously what political ideology I was going to adhere to when and if I do join the government. I considered this a rather important question and I could understand what motivated my friend to ask it. It is often said that to make a communist out of a young student from the Third World, send him to the United tates, and to make a capitalist out of this same student, send him to the Soviet Union. This has not quite worked in my case because I am not a firm believer in ideology. If I do get to the position where I would have to make major foreign policies, I would try to be neither against the West nor against the East, but simply pro my country and my continent. I would be in charge of defending my nation's and my continent's interests and I would not hesitate to support the Americans or the Russians if they worked in line with our beliefs. Again, I am not a traditional ideologus! !

Well, let me wish you all the best at this merry snowy Christmas season that I am fortunately going to escape from, and to the students let me say that while a B.A. may may not be everything, it is at least a beginning to whatever you want out of life. So, study hard and I am sure it would be exciting for me to meet one of you one day in some world capital, in your official position as a U.S. representative. If you ever find yourselves somewhere in Africa, don't forget to come to Cameroon and look me up. We have enough room to put you up, many of you indeed, for several days. I plan to be back in the States for graduate school in September 1973, but in case you want to get in touch with me for anything, write to any one of the following three addresses: Sammy Kum Buo, c/o Rev. J. C. Kangsen, Box 19, BUET, South-West Province, United Republic of Cameroon, West Africa. This is home for me but I doubt how much time I would be spending at home. My social addresses are:c/o Jerry Komia DOMATOB, Faculty of Law and Economic Sciences, United University of Cameroon, YAOUNDE, Cameroon. c/o Edward Tiagha, 308 West 103rd St., Apt. 8F, New York, New York 10025, USA. Moravian Nips JC Grapplers

by Steve People

Tuesday night, December 5, Juniata College Memorial gym Moravian vs. Juniata College. That was the setting for Juniata's second wrestling match of the year and it was an exciting one. Fans were treated to lots of action and the match went down to the wire. Juniata grapplers came on the mats to wrestle and Moravian just pulled it out of the fire with a pin in the last match.

Three Juniata grapplers were defeated by ten or more points giving St. Francis a four point team score decision in those matches.

At 134, Juniata's Mark Brown lost 11-10 to Dan Knepp in an exciting, fast match. Knepp's reversal late in the third period gave him the win.

Jim McCartney, J.C.'s captain, sizes up his Moravian opponent. McCartney went on to win.

Mark Salisbury fought George Hummel to a 6-6 draw at 118. Captain Jim McCartney looked back in form with a decisive 7-5 win at 126. Myron Zimmerman and Goeff Clark were both quite impressive, decking their opponents in displays of fine wrestling. Todd Price worked Moravian's Joe Bender so hard that the Moravian grappler was finally disqualified for stalling and Price was awarded the match.

Moravian recorded three falls in the upper weight classes, the last in the heavyweight class which gave them a 26-23 win. Moravian never led in the match but the three falls in the upper weights made up the deficit and gave them the win. With the fine display our wrestlers put on, we should look forward to more of the same this year with our boys coming out on the other end.

WRESTLING

by Steve Peoples

December 2 – Wrestling fans watched Juniata go down to a 42-6 defeat on the home mats on Saturday against St. Francis College. Last year Juniata lost to St. Francis by only one point, 24-23, but this year they proved to be too strong for Coach Bill Berrier's grapplers. For those of you who don't know, St. Francis is a wrestling strong-hold and takes on such schools as Notre Dame in their regular season and competes against the best in the nation at the National Tournament at Wilkes College at the end of each season.

Steve Oak came through with the only Juniata win, pinning heavyweight Alan Diehl with a bar arm and half nelson in the second period of their match.

St. Francis registered falls against four Juniata opponents, two in second period action and two in third periods. These pins were in the 118, 150, 177, and 190 pound classes.

Cagers Drop to Lycoming, Dickinson In First Home Games of BB Season

by Chuck Rahauser

The 1972-73 Juniata basketball team made its debut on November 29 at their home floor and lost 74-69 to the tough Dickinson Cagers. Coach Jack Swinderman, beginning his 22nd straight year as a basketball mentor, seemed rather pleased with the performance of his young squad.

Juniata looked a little tight at the start as the Dickinson five grabbed a quick 15-8 lead. However, it was only a matter of a few minutes until the Indians began connecting on their long outside shots. Juniata's defense, appearing rather relaxed at times, had difficulty in stopping the fast break; however, Coach Swinderman's men never let down. Pobbie Carles, a freshman from Altoona, stole the show in the first half as he hit continuously from the 20-25 foot range. At intermission Dickinson led with 41-37.

Individual scoring honors go to Carles with 21 points and to Williams who scored 20 points. In rebounding, the Indians captured a 47-46 edge as Williams collected 18 and Tim Tabor 12. The Junior Varsity led by Mike Kenealy and Gavin Ford, easily defeated the Red Devils 78-71. The team displayed an awesome defense that was coordinated with good shooting and tremendous hustle.

During second half action, the "young" lads of Coach Swinderman out-hustled Dickinson, and managed to knot the score and eventually grab the lead by a point, 53-52. The Red Devils however issued a strong comeback, led by senior Dick Barnoski, and Dickinson was ahead to stay.

Robbie Carles, "15", attempts to thwart a Dickinson two pointer.

by Tony Martuzas

There's nothing unusual about a visiting team being heckled by rowdy, partisan fans. But, by "greasers"? Sure enough, some 40 members of Susquehannah's student body appeared at the game costumed as greasers, cheering for their favorite team and of course, booing and heckling the Indian basketball players. The greasers aggravation failed, as the Crusaders were dumped 67-57.

The Crusaders jumped to a quick six point lead on three straight baskets by Jim Baglia, Paul Hinsch, and Ralph Wolkenhauver, obviously soaked with emotion due the great spirit generated by the home team crowd. Susquehannah managed to lead at the half, by a six point margin (30-24), but the enthusiasm dwindled and the Indians played like the outstanding unit they actually are. They riddled the Crusaders man to man Defense in the second half.

The Juniata Cagers came back early in the second half by shots from frosh Tim ("Mr.") Tabor and two straight baskets by frosh Donnie Williams pulled the Indians within two points, 32-30. At the 17:24 mark, another frosh, Robbie Carles There's four frosh in the starting five, the other frosh in Oscar Hatchett, alias "Dr. J") stole the ball and knotted the score at 32-ALL. The Indians were ahead to stay when Donnie Williams connected from the corner, and after a Tabor rebound, Senior Tom Rinaldi scored with 13:44 left.

The Susquehannah game was a marked difference from the Lock Haven game, where the Indians lost 75-58. At Lock Haven, the Cagers ran into early foul trouble, lacked hustle, lost their poise, had trouble coping with Lock Haven's tough defense, and just played an overall "flat" game.

It was highly amusing watching the Susquehannah greasers tormenting the Indians during their warm-up. Donnie Williams seemed to have enjoyed the heckling more than any other player on the team as he displayed a huge "ear-to-ear" grin. Donnie remarked the greasers actually got him more "psyched" for the game. Well, there weren't any greasers present at last Saturday's home game against Lycoming to heckle Donnie and the rest of the team. Too bad there aren't any greasers in Huntingdon.

Lycoming

The Juniata College Basketball team hosted Lycoming College on Saturday evening, December 9th, in hope of gaining victory number two of the 1972-73 season. Lycoming, a tough physical team, came into the game with an even 1-1 slate, their loss coming in their opening contest with Bowie State 106-101.

During the early minutes of the game, the Indians played exceptional ball as they shot well from the 15 ft. range and displayed aggressive defense. After six minutes of action the score read Juniata 14 Lycoming 7. Then, as though the Indians did not appreciate their feelings of success, the momentum changed and Lycoming seemed to take control of the game. Hitting shots from inside the ten ft. range, the opponents grabbed a 32-28 halftime lead.

After the break, Juniata had trouble finding the range with their wild outside shots and Lycoming built up comfortable leads of ten to twelve points. During this interval, Lycoming's Steve Cogan (20 pts.) connected with six straight points. But Coach Swinderman's men did not quit; at the ten minute mark Lycoming's lead was cut to six points as freshmen Don Williams (21 pts.) and Robbie Carles (10 pts.) hit in clutch situations. However, the Indians' respectable 1-3-1 zone defense could not handle the inside play of Lycomings' Dick Henninger who scored 25 pts., and as the final buzzer sounded the dejected Juniata cagers wandered back to their locker room.

The junior varsity also tested defeat as they suffered their first loss of the season 90-77.

Plato Topic of Lecture Series

by Dave MacVeigh

Dr. Richard Hunter will be presenting a lecture entitled "The Allegory of the Cave" on Thursday, January 18 at 8:15 p.m. in the Shoemaker Galleries.

The cave referred to is the cave in The Republic by Plato. Dr. Hunter plans to show that, even though the allegory of the cave is about ⅔ through the book, it is really the introduction, and that it is the true motivating idea of the book. Dr. Hunter thinks that it is "the basis of all Platonic thinking."

According to Hunter, the allegory is a parallel to Christian salvation. It can also be compared with modern psychology, he says.

This lecture is another in the series of lectures presented by the English Department. It should be interesting for all those who have read The Republic, and especially to those lucky students enrolled in HEH-Greek.

"Theatre of Deaf" Coming to Campus On January 25

Coming to Juniata's Oller Hall on Jan. 25 is an exciting new theatrical form — the National Theatre of the Deaf. This theatre uses the superb ability of deaf people to communicate visually.

Clayton Briggs, speech and theatre professor at Juniata, said this should be one of the most important cultural events this year. Doris Goehring put it concisely. "Any people who don't come to see this performance are dumb fools!"

This company will present "Gilgamesh," the oldest written work in existence, pre-dating Homor by 1500 years. The performance uses sign language, voice, mime and music to superbly convey this epic about gods, god-men and heroes.

Judith Crist proclaimed the National Theatre of the Deaf as ". . .one of the most exciting kind of theatre that I have encountered!"

Moving up with Siedzikowski will be several editorial staff editions. Janet Bartschat will assume the position of Associate Editor while Alice Boomhower will take over as layout editor. The position of News Editor will be filled by James Hunter.

Two Juniata Students Study Gov't in Washington Semester

Two Juniata College juniors recently gained first-hand information about the workings of the American government this fall through internships with the Republican National Committee and Common Cause.

H. Christopher Peterson of Star Route, Mifflin, and Bruce L. Moyer of Pottstown were both participants in the cooperative Washington Semester program between Juniata and other selected national colleges and the American University of Washington, D.C.

The purpose of this program, according to American University, is "to provide a realistic picture of the processes of government, far richer in detail and more accurate than can be gained in an ordinary academic environment."

Dr. Harry V. Klug, a member of the Juniata political science department, is the program's representative at Juniata. "Immense!" is Dr. Klug's estimation of the benefit of the program. "Academically, the student gets very high caliber political science training, including specialized courses which cannot be offered at his home college; culturally, he gets the enormous range of activities of Washington, D.C. and in terms of his future, he makes economic, academic, and political contacts which are not available at any of the institutions from which the students come." Juniata College has been associated with the Washington Semester program since 1967.

According to Dr. Klug, "Chris and Bruce were selected for the program on the basis of outstanding work in the Juniata political science department, outstanding work in general as Juniata College students, and due to general maturity and ability to do advanced work with top-flight political science students from other colleges in the United States"

Peterson worked under the regular Washington Semester program while Moyer worked under the Washington Urban Semester, a companion program. The program is administered by the School of Government and Public Administration of American University. Course work for both studies included a seminar worth two course credits which consists primarily of meetings with public officials, political figures, lobbyists, and others active in the American national government; a research project; and an internship with an appropriate legislative, administrative, or political office.

For his research project Chris developed a decision-making model using as case studies two bills considered by the Science Research and Development subcommittee of the House committee on Science and Astronautics. In particular it dealt with the concepts of influence flow and influence stock and how these two are interrelated in the decision-making process. His internship assignment has been to work for the Republican National Committee in the College Republican division. He helped to monitor campus newspapers from approximately 75 universities and colleges from around the country the purpose of which is to pinpoint the issues that most concern college young people. One major project was making an in-depth comparison of the rules that governed this year's Republican National Convention with those that will govern the 1976 Republican National Convention.

Bruce did a quantitative and qualitative study of legal aid services and public interest law work being done in the District of Columbia. He studied their value as institutions of social change for the poor as first designed by the Office of Economic Opportunity's (OEO) "war on poverty" philosophy of the early 60's.

For his internship Bruce worked with "Common Cause," a citizens' lobbying group organized by John Gardner, former Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare and former chairman of the Urban Coalition. Common Cause's efforts in the past have been associated with reforming the governmental institution and repairing the processes of government, especially in the areas of money matters and secrecy.

Common Cause monitored campaign funds of all congressional and presidential candidates during the past election. It is aiming at Congressional reform, especially the systems of seniority and committee secrecy. Bruce was involved with congressional reform work, home rule for the District of Columbia, and busing.

Next semester Bruce will be studying in London in a political science program directed by Drew University. Juniata is a subsidiary member of the program. The study is directed through the University of London and the London University of Economics, with visiting lecturers from those institutions. He

by Henry Siedzikowski

This past week, a questionnaire was sent to all students on the Juniata campus regarding the College Health Center. The questionnaire was sent out by a special committee set up by the Student Senate to study and report on the Health Cener.

The questions asked covered a broad area of concerns and should provide a sizable amount of information to evaluate the health center.

Besides questions concerning how much the students use the health center, and related areas of interest, there were several questions dealing with the student's feelings about the health service, and their suggestions and complaints.

Information is specifically requested on the possible shortcomings of the health service and how the health service might be improved.

Although all the results have not been tabulated yet, a couple of significant facts have already come to light. One is that a sizable portion of Juniata students have never visited the college health center. One of the major complaints of students seems to be difficulty in seeing the doctor, and many students have suggested staggering her hours during the week.

The student government committee is now in the process of compiling the results. When that is finished, they will present a report on the state of the Juniata College Health Center.

Sat. Concert Change of Pace for All

by Jim Hunter

Last Saturday, to provide a change of scenery, a concert was held in Oller Hall. Reaction to the show was indeed varied. While some danced in the aisles, others sat, bored in their seats. The Big City Music Band, a product of West Chester State College, brought the hall out to the aisles, dancing. They surprised the audience with their sophisticated equipment, including an unusual Echo chamber. While some enthused by the band, one student reacted this way.

Saturday night, nothing to do,
As usual. No something different,
A concert! A concert you say?
Yes, Big City Music Band.
In Oller 8:00 P.M.

In Oller 8:00 P.M.
Oh, Wow, equipment, tons of it.
Sit in the front row.
Heavy Duty, if they turn that on They'll blow every fuse and my ears.
Gee, I don't like sitting in front,
If they're bad, how can I sneak out?
The band is on!
Medleys, the Beatles
The Beach Boys — their own music.
Leroy, your mama's calling.
"Fred talk" — hose around on stage.
Is Fred gay, Leroy too, How about—
The bass player with a wig?
Or are they all goofing on us?
A break — A cigarette — Hi Deacon.
Back for more — Brutus; Tull
Jumping Jack Flash, Johnny B. Goode.
So that was Saturday night's Big city music band.

Convocation To Be Held In Oller Hall

by Ron Mowen

On January 24, the All College Convocation will be held at Juniata College. The up-coming event will take place in Alumni Hall at 8:00 P.M. Dennis Benson, who is nationally known for his creative techniques in both worship experiences and education, will conduct the service.

The convocation will be a new experience and will be quite interesting. For those who are looking for something different in the worship scene, this experience should be unique.

All are welcome to attend the service.

EDITORIAL

by Patrick E. Fleagle

If Christmas' prove to be as bad as this past Christmas, perhaps we should just cancel the holiday altogether. At no time in history was the ring of Peace on Earth so hollow. The United States can ill afford the type of peace which we had over the holidays.

While I was home in my easy chair listening to cheery Christmas programs on T.V., hospitals in Hanoi were being bombed. While American city blocks were lit up with Christmas decorations, Vietnamese city blocks were being completely leveled by B-52's. While I was opening Christmas presents, the North Vietnamese were closing coffins.

Even the average beer-drinking American was caught up in the irony of a so-called "peaceful" Christmas season. While the All-American Richard Nixon was trying to keep the Redskins game from being blacked out, he had one of his cronies submitting legislation to control the entire telecommunications media.

What does all of this tell us about the American people? Are they vegetables who can't make moral decisions for themselves or are they so conditioned that they automatically condone bad moral decisions? Perhaps it is neither; perhaps their consciences have been muted by their inability to communicate their feelings to the government. It results in frustration, pure frustration. For example, after nearly exhausting their energies in a peace effort, how does the American peace movement feel after their peace hopes proved futile, and peace was once again, NOT at hand.

Perhaps the Nixon Administration is using its best method of usurping power, keeping the people in ignorance. It's tragic to think that if the U.S. did not have a watchdog press, the bombing of Hanoi civilian areas may never have been known, at least not in time to protest the actions. But even the press is badly hampered by traveling restrictions and a Pentagon spokesman who gives them virtually no information. Its quite a different situation with Mr. Nixon's proposed telecommunications legislation. His expert in that field, Mr. Whitehead, has given the public the image that his proposed FCC legislation would be doing them a great service while in fact it is taking away the fundamental freedom of the press by putting over the telecommunication industry's head an implied form of governmental censorship.

This reporter cannot give concrete answers to these problems recently encountered at Christmas, for I too am somewhat hung-up in this feeling of frustration. But I do have a suggestion. If the government is going to be hypocritical next Christmas and say "Peace on Earth" while bombing North Vietnamese cities and if it is going to speak of "Goodwill toward Men" and then try to usurp our freedom of the press, then let's just cancel Christmas and hope we have something to pray about the next Thanksgiving.

THE BIG HOUSE

by Richard Mettler

Occasionally we come across a book that not only allows us to imagine a period of history but actually places us right into that period with all the flare, hustle & bustle, grandeur, and heartache. Tallulah by Grendan Gill reveals an individual as insane and beautiful as the times.

Tallulah Bankhead came from a long line of eccentric Bankheads but she undoubtedly surpassed each and every one. At sixteen she was aspiring to be a Broadway actress and became the darling pet of the Barrymores. She often boasted that under her bed she kept a shoe-boxful of coccaine.

Tallulah possessed unusual dramatic talents but her real life melodrama is what depicted her personality. At the age of 23, Sommerset Maughm dismissed her from being Sadie Thompson in "Rain." She remained true to her nature by taking twenty aspirin in a banal attempt to commit suicide. She was awakened the next morning by a phone call giving her the role in the Noel Coward comedy.

Tallulah blossomed into a queen flapper outdrinking all takers, smoking 150 Kents a day, and having sex with a virgin Ivy League student. Columnist Earl Wilson has ever been mistaken for a man on supposed to have asked "Have you the telephone?, alluding to the sandpaper quality of her voice. "No", retorted Tallulah, "Have you?"

Brenda Gill has allotted Tallulah 88 pages of text and 300 photographs. We see Tallulah with her only husband whom she later divorced, actor John Emery. There are also numerous photographs of Tallulah with friends such as Katherine Hepburn and Cecil Beaton. We are also granted profiles of some of Tallulah's playmates, Robert Benchley, Donald Cook, John Hay Whitney and Napier Sturt.

She constantly worked on her image as being frivolous and free but she also struggled equally as hard to become the great actress which she never became. Gill said, "She was always a star but only intermittently a superb actress". People came not to see Tallulah assuming a role on the stage but just to see Tallulah being Tallulah. Her greatest success came from her effort in Lillian Hellman's "The Little Foxes".

Paramount missed the point in trying to develop her as a dramaticist instead of using her obvious talent for comedy. They wanted to make her into a second Marlene Dietrick who was the reigning sex pot. During those early days of Hollywood the idea was to go on doing that which was successful instead of experimenting. Paramount failed miserably. In fact it was only Alfred Hithcock's "Life Boat" that gave her any success at all in films.

In remembering Tallulah we must keep in mind what was going on at the time. Marlene Dietrich was wooing mens' hearts, Hitler was making big plans, "No No Nanette" was on everyone's lips, and Tallulah was giving old bitties infinite material for gossip and prim disapproval. The only sure thing about Tallulah was that she definitely belonged to the time and place in which she lived.

King's Record Appears In Two Internat'l Publications

Mr. Robert King, of the Juniata College Music Dept. and Conductor of the Altoona Symphony, has just been notified that his biography and professional record will appear in two internatonal publications devoted to outstanding leaders in many professions. His record will appear in both the "Dictionary of International Biography" and "Two Thousand Men of Achievement" is both published in England. Both publications contain records of men well-known in the English-speaking world for their high standing in their chosen field, but the "Two Thousand Men of Achievement" it a highly selective list of individuals considered to be at the top of their profession. Dr. King's record emphasizes his attainments as an educator, violinist and conductor.

He began his career as a teacher of violin and music history at Ithaca College, and has continued his interest in these areas over many years, including stints at the Un. of New Mexico, Un. of Ky., State Un. of New York, Juniata College and as a graduate assistant at the Un. of N Carolina and the Un. of Ill.

At the age of six, he began his study of the violin, and continued with teachers who represent the greatest tradition of violin playing, both European and American. His earliest teacher was a pupil of the famous Hungarian violinist Jeno Hubay, and later instruction came from Joseph Knitzer, a pupil of Auer, Andre de Ribaupierre, a protege of Ystye and Louis Krasner, an intimate of Alban Berg, for whom he wrote his Violin Concerto. In his capacity as a violinist, he has appeared frequently as a soloist, as a performer of chamber music and as concertmaster of several orchestras. He is currently Director and performer in the Chamber Music Series at Juniata College and of a chamber music series in Manistique, Michigan, which recently was awarded a state grant. At Eastman, he served as concertmaster for the Little Symphony composed of select students from the school, and at the Un. of Ill. where at various times he was concertmaster of the Symphonette, the Un. Symphony and the Opera Orchestra. While teaching at the Un. of New Mexico, he became concertmaster of the Albuquerque Symphony, under Hans Lange, a former assistant of Toscanini.

Although Dr. King had studied conducting at Eastman and with Pierre Monteux, his first conducting opportunity came while teaching at Ithaca College. He was asked to assume the position as Conductor and Music Director of the Ithaca Civic Opera Co. which was preparing a performance of "Don Giovanni." The resulting full-scale performance received such enthusiastic reception by both critics and public that he continued in this position for three years, leaving only to pursue his doctoral studies.

While working on his doctorate at the Un. of Ill., he continued an active participation as a performer and conductor. He served as Assistant Conductor of the Un. of Ill. Symphony, under Bernard Goodman, and appeared both as soloist and conductor of the orchestra for the first time in the history of the group. Chamber music has always been a major interest, so that he studied ensemble playing under the members of the Walden Quartet and appeared in several recitals with them as a violist, both on campus and in Bethlehem, Albuquerque and at the State Un. of New York.

Letter to the Editor

Dear President Stauffer:

Once again the Juniata College students have demonstrated their concern for the welfare of the community and especially those in need.

The Bloodmobile sponsored by Juniata College on Monday, December 4, was another successful of blood which exceeded our quota endeavor. We collected 119 pints of 110.

The attitude, conduct, and cooperation on the part of the students were indeed exemplary and a credit to the college. Their actions are but a reflection of the fine program at Juniata and of the excellent leadership being provided at all all of the members of the Huntingpress our gratitude; suffice to say, levels. Words cannot properly exdon Chapter of the American Red Cross truly appreciate what the college is doing for the community.

It is always dangerous to single out individuals for special recognition, but without the help and cooperation of Mr. Bruce Bader, Cynthia Smith, Philip Woodworth, Gary Moore, and Arvil Lovette, Jr., we could not have accomplished our goal. They did an outstanding job and merit special praise.

On behalf of our Board, we extend to you, your staff, and the with the project our sincere gratimany, many students who helped annual blood quota which would operation, we could not reach our tude. Without your help and cocreate a serious hardship to those of our area who are in need of blood.

Gratefully yours,
Carl R. Bruno
Blood Chairman

by Edward Kinchley Evans

Recently, in a 'letter to the editor' column of the Huntingdon Daily News, a woman in Mt. Union wrote castigating the Clifton Theatre for showing an x rated movie. It would seem the lady has a teen-age son and I guess he's bored. Anyway, "there is just nothing around the area for teenagers to do" and if there was a decent movie, then, at least a couple of his leisure hours could be hopefully scheduled into a safety zone. It's my guess that he would have liked to have gone to see "Zora" but the policeman at the door was checking I.D. cards. So, society protects some of us from venality.

The rest of the paper was just pictures and stories about these deprived under-agers drag-car racing up and down our sleepy little streets, chasing girls, short cutting up one way streets, the wrong way, and every now and then suddenly stopped cold by the actuality that death is a game with no winners. It's my nearsighted contention that to respect life, whether your own or another's, you need to have lived more than a handfull of years. Responsibility, pain, and a bit of sadness that aging alone rewards you, teaches you the gift of being ever so carefull with life. But let's not let our kiddies get bored. They're big enough now to have lethal toys. Let's don't teach them self respect, let's just keep them amused.

Now the film that went on a little ahead of our x-rated one, was titled "Nickolas and Alexandre" AND was rated g. The night I went, you could have died from lonliness. Was our concerned mother insistent with her child that he attend this excellent movie? Sometimes I wonder why anyone with taste bothers to create films. True, it was a slow movie, a long movie, an educative movie, not particularly entertaining unless you're fascinated by the enigma of human folly. Did you see it? It is as much your responsibility to start being selective with how you spend your time and if you chose "Zora" and neglected "Nickolas and Alexandre", then you deprived yourself of an excellent lesson in self deceit, the ego ruination of absolute power.

Most of life quickly degenerates into struggle for possession of control, authority, or influence over others. We end up in our emotional arsenal in this attempt to motivate those we 'love' into pleasing our own vanities.

When a film of this genre comes into the vicinity of your awareness, go and learn about yourself. Either you know who you are and what is the foundation of this knowledge and so direct your own life. . .or else someone else will gladly take on this responsibility, generally to yours and their ruin. The movie explored in great depth many levels of this failing of ours and if you have learned to use your exposure to creative experiences to evaluate your progress as you merrily trot down the alleyways of existence, then by all means if you avoided it before, search it down and see it before it is packed away by the vulgar merchants who judge all things by stacks of little coins.

What the woman in Mt. Union should have complained about was the dead popcorn being sold at a fancy price in a dimly lit lobby, but then again, it was the end of the month, oh well.

Motions Concerning Vietam War Topics Discussed By Stud. Gov't.

by Patrick Minnick

How long has Vietnam been an issue? Well finally at this late date, the Juniata Student Government has gone on record with a proposal concerning the matter. The Senators of Juniata voted unanimously with two abstentions to urge an immediate end of the conflict and to urge congressmen to vote for the end of all appropriations for the Vietnam war, which would in effect shut off the war regardless of what thethe Nixon Administration plans to do.

Also a part of the motion was a plan to organize an anti-war committee on campus for the purpose of contacting Pennsylvania representatives. Committee members will go to Washington to lobby for an end to the war, if it is deemed necessary. Co-chairmen of the committee are Henry Siedzikowski, who also introduced the measure and Senator Jack Carton. A form letter will be sent to all U.S. Senators and to the twenty-seven Pa. representatives in Washington. A special attempt will also be made to reach a number of the state's congressmen who have not yet taken a definitive stand on how they will vote when the move to cut off Vietnam war appropriations is brought up.

S.G. President Dave Andrews and a few of his Student Senator colleagues will journey to Washington, January 18, 19, and 20 to work with the National Student Lobby on the upcoming bills concerning grants for higher education. The NSL, which Andrews describes as "a very efficient lobbying organization," expedites the contacting and influencing of congressmen because it has official lobbying privileges. Also, S.G. is looking forward to the National Student Lobby's convention which will take place at the end of February.

Proposals will be made to the administration of Juniata concerning the improvement of the Health Service after all the results of the recent survey of the service are in. The committee on the Health Service is chaired by Henry Siedzikowski.

In other S.G. news, Junior Senator Mike Long has resigned from Student Government and is leaving Juniata to continue his schooling at Pitt. A decision on how to fill the vacancy will be forthcoming from Student Government.

King's Record

tion at the Un. of New Mexico, Dr. King continued to teach violin and chamber music, and also assumed the conductorship of the Un. Symphony and the Opera Department's production of Gluck's "Orfeo," while acting as concertmaster of the Albuquerque Symphony.

While here, he received an invitation to conduct two orchestras and to teach at the Un. of Ky. The position involved conducting the Un. Symphony and also the Central Ky. Youth Orchestra which had the reputation as one of the finest of such groups in the nation. Under Dr. King's direction, this group gave outstanding performances of such works as Stravinsky's "Fire Bird" which is ordinarily attempted only by professional, adult orchestras. The superior caliber of this orchestra was recognized by the U.S. State Dept. who requested tapes and illustrative matter to be displayed at the Amerika Haus in Vienna, as an example of the best work achieved by young people in America. For this and other accomplishments, conductor and orchestra received an award by the National Sertoma Clubs in recognition of superior achievement.

In addition to his work with the Youth Orchestra and the University of Ky. Dr. King organized and conducted the Lexington Philharmonic Orchestra which he conducted for five years. In a few years, this orchestra became one of the outstanding semi-professional orchestras in the South and Mid-West and received critical acclaim from the distinguished critic of the Louisville "Courrier-Journal."

Before coming to Altoona, he received an offer to teach at the State Un. of York, where he was to reorganize the Un. Symphony, and teach violin, and music history at the undergraduate and graduate levels. The lack of opportunities for working with a competent orchestra, were however, not satisfying, and an offer to conduct the Altoona Symphony and teach at the Altoona Campus of Pa. State Un. was quickly accepted.

Dr. King and his family moved to Altoona in 1967 and he began teaching at Juniata College the following year. Since this time, the Altoona Symphony has continued to grow both in size and quality to the point where it performed a much-acclaimed concert including the Beethoven "Ninth Symphony" in 1971. The need for young musicians to gain additional playing experience prompted him to organize and conduct the Blair-Bedford Youth Symphony which has given several public performances, including one honoring former Governor Shaffer. In 1971, he also appeared as guest conductor for the Western and Central Division District Orchestra in Altoona. His interest in creating programs of artistic integrity and audience appeal was recognized by a special award by the Pa. Council on the Arts in 1971.

Dr. King and family reside in Hollidaysburg in a very "musical house", his wife, Mary, also teaches at Juniata College and appears as a piano soloist and as a violinist in the Altoona Symphony and in chamber music concerts. Their son, Warren, is studying cello and also plays with the symphony.

In addition to his selection for publication in two international publication, Dr. King is also listed in "Who's Who in the East".

JC Wins Exciting Game in Last Seconds

Ursinus

by Brian Clemens

Juniata snapped a five-nine game losing streak Friday night by defeating Ursinus in a 51-49 thriller before one of the better crowds of the year at Memorial Gymnasium.

Mike Kenealy hit a ten foot jump shot from the baseline with only seven seconds remaining on the clock to assure Juniata of its third win in eleven games.

As usual, Juniata jumped out to an early lead behind the hustle of Oscar Hatchett and Don Montine and the shooting of Ron Cokles and Tim Taboyn. In fact the Indians had a 26-21 lead with three minutes left in the first half. It was at this time that the Bears from Ursinus began finding gaping holes in Juniata's 1-3-1 zone defense to hit for many easy shots and took a 29-26 lead at the midway point.

The second half started in much the same fashion as the first half, ended with the visitors scoring four unanswered points to run the count to 33-26 which forced Coach Swinderman to switch to a man-to-man defense. This seven point difference was the Bears' biggest lead of the evening as they also led 39-32. Juniata's second half comeback was led by a few players who Indians fans hadn't seen all year. Good shooting by Kenealy and determined hustle by junior letterman Gary Ober were the keys in Juniata's victory. Juniata finally took the lead on a rebound shot by Kenealy with 2:50 remaining in the game. With 1:35 remaining and the Indians leading 49-47, Bill Downey canned two foul shots to knot the score which set the stage for Kenealy's game ending heroics. The Indians made 35% of their shots for the evening. Tim Tabor, playing one of his better all around games of the season, was high man with 14 points. Kenealy and Caples chipped in with 10 a piece.

In the preliminary game, Juniata's JV's led by Tony Kamnicar scored 25 points and Mark Jula's fifteen assists defeated Ursinus' underlings 96-54 to record their third win in seven starts.

Gettysburg

by Chuck Rahauser

Last week was rather disappointing for Coach Swinderman and his basketball team, as they were edged by IUP and trounced by Gettysburg. On Saturday, January 6th, at the Indiana court, the JC Indians played respectable ball, staying within a few points throughout the entire contest, before bowing down in defeat 71-61. Coach Swinderman employed a tenacious box-in-one type of zone defense in hope of containing Indiana's big gun, Randy Allen. Although Allen did manage to score 19 points, Indiana seemed to have trouble in generating a consistent offensive attack. Juniata's Donnie Williams played one of the best games of his young collegiate career as he led all scorers with 24 points and collected 13 rebounds. Robbie Carles also turned in one of his usual outstanding performances as he scored 17 points, matching his season's average.

After witnessing this contest, the "young" Juniata team looked like they were really "coming on" and adapting fast to the challenges of college basketball; however, in review of their encounter with Gettysburg last Wednesday, the JC cagers must now realize that experience is something that cannot be gained overnight. Juniata was literally "blown off" the court by the powerful Bullet squad, 106-66. The Gettysburg fast break and pressure defense was just too much for Coach Swinderman's "young" lads to cope with. The Indians seemed dazed as they were guilty of numerous unnecessary turnovers and overall lackadaisical play. High scorers for Juniata were center Tim Tabor with 16 points, Williams with 13 points, and Carles with 12 counters.

Not counting last Friday's contest with Ursinus, Juniata college basketball team has thus far compiled a record of two wins and eight losses; however, don't be dismayed by the present record, for this is merely the beginning of another rebuilding year at JC.

"Gilqamesh" To Be Acted Out By NTD

by Tim Reimer

One of the offerings of the Focus Series this season will be the presentation of "Gilgamesh" by the National Theatre of the Deaf in Oller Hall on Thursday evening, January 25 at 8 o'clock. "Gilgamesh" is a stage re-creation of the Sumerian epic written 1500 years before Homer—an epic pre-dating, with its own version, parts of the Bible. Directing this season's company will be Larry Attick, assisted by scenic designer David Hays, costumer Fred Vopel, and light director John Gleason. Francois Baschet's "sculptures", expressly commissioned for the NTD, will provide the music. The "sound instruments" are art work constructed from glass rods and metal tubes. The company will be using a new set of twelve instruments this year for the first time.

This project of the Eugene O'Neill Theatre Center has met with spontaneous acclaim, a rare occurance for such a bold, new concept in theatre. This unique company is now in its eleventh national tour along with having completed two Broadway runs and five European tours.

The Eugene O'Neill Theatre Center became the sponsoring organization for the NTD in the summer of 1967. The Vocational Rehabilitation Administration helps to fund the project while the Office of Education and Department of HEW finance an acting school for the deaf actors.

Among the government's reasons for financing the company were to bring better theatre to the deaf community, to create pride among the deaf by proving that they can contribute a valid art form of their own to the community, and to correct misconceptions about these gifted people. But the NTD should not be confused with a theatre for the deaf. It is an eloquent and rewarding experience for both deaf and hearing audiences. The O'Neill Center's aim in this venture is purely artistic, while the government's is social. Yet, if the artistic aim succeeds, the social goals must follow. Hearing audiences have been shaken by their first encounter with this talented company. If they came with the intention of seeing a performance by an amateur group, they soon learned that the actors on stage were offering insights and emotions that are rarely experienced in the theatre. Il Giorno, the Roman newspaper has stated, "These excellent actors touched by the angel of silence, bring us a fresh understanding of the inestimable value of words."

"The ability of deaf people to sense and communicate things by other means than verbal is fantastic," says David Hays. "Because of the reliance on sources other than the human voice, actors are communicating with audiences with a kind of depth and intensity we have never seen before. This is happy, joyful work."

Food Service Meeting Airs Most Student Complaints

by Pat Minnick

Heard any complaints about lousy food and dirty utensils lately? Maybe you have a complaint of your own. Well, don't just moan to your roommate or the folks on your hall. Take it to the food service people, Chuck Waugh or Ed Straub. They claim to have an open ear and they are the ones who can make the change that will benefit you and whole student body. If you can't get satisfaction, then go to a Food Service Committee meeting with any other dissatisfied Juniata food consumers and air your beefs.

The most recent meeting of the committee was held Thursday, January 18, in the Faculty Lounge of Ellis Hall. About a dozen students, some with petitions from students who couldn't make the meeting, voiced complaints while, Chuck and Ed, along with Mary Jane Norris, a regular employee of the service responded to the charges and promised to change methods of operations so as to improve the food service. The interchange went basically as follows:

Students: Lately some of the food has been cold.

Food Service: Three factors enter into this. Student assistants and regular employees have turned the regulators on the steam tables down because the heat from them makes work more uncomfortable. In the future, all steam tables will run at top settings. Also, the Line Two steam table was out of order for a period of time after Christmas break. Also, people working on the line have set the food up on the serving counter which is not immediately used because of a lapse in the flow of students coming to a meal. We will try to minimize this.

Students: There is a shortage of wooden salad bowls.

Food Service: This is our fault. We have ordered more bowls.

Students: Glasses especially recently are marked and covered with a white film. One glass had mouth marks on it.

Food Service: Our machine which washes glasses mal-functions sporadically and does not remove the mineral content from the water. The white film is completely safe, but we have tried to get it fixed and will continue to do so.

Students: We have found silverware in the bins with peanut butter and other food on it and one student checked through four utensils before finding a clean one.

Food Service: This is mainly because those who separate the silverware occasionally do not spot two utensils stuck together and feed them through the washer in this condition. We will try to improve our silverware cleaning procedure in the future.

Students: Our diet contains too much starch and grease, but not enough meat.

Food Service: Our menus are prepared by a company in Ohio and we serve according to their specifications.

Students: Meat portions served are too small and many people including girls on diets go back for seconds to get what they feel is a decent serving.

Food Service: We may increase portions in the future especially those of chicken.

Students: Speaking of chicken, we usually feel that it isn't done well enough.

Food Service: Chicken will be cooked more.

Students: We notice that many times you serve pancakes, waffles, and french toast with no meat for dinner. We feel that this is not an adequate dinner.

Food Service: We feel that students may want a change in their diet, rather than eating the same tpye meat servings once a week.

Students: But we would be hap-

Plato's Allegory of Cave Was Topic For Dr. Hunter

by Richard Mettler

This past Thursday Dr. Richard Hunter delivered a lecture at Shoemaker Gallery entitled Plato's Allegory of the Cave. Dr. Hunter, student of literature, philosophy, and religion is most intrigued with book seven of the ten books of The Republic, and is also intrigued with Plato's approach to the significance of mathematics and the meanings that certain mathematical combinations have to do with the macrocosm as in found in book eight.

I was impressed with the way Dr. Hunter covered such a vast amount of material in such a short time and the excitement that he managed to generate among his listeners.

Those who were in attendence learned many fascinating details of Plato's life such as the impact that Pythagorus had on Plato which could account for some of Plato's somewhat pre-occupation with mathematics and especially geometric irregularities and similarities, which occur in the universe.

The first two books of The Republic is more or less an analytical approach to Plato's theory so those who would encounter difficulty in interpreting poetry and vision would be able to share in the ideas put forth throughout. Dr. Hunter refers to the seventh book and especially the allegory of the cave as the most fascinating part of the The Republic and should probably be the introduction. It's the actual motivation for The Republic. The allegory of the cave possesses much poetic talent but at the same time reveals Plato's logical approach to his conception of the ideal state where the philosophers make up the ruling class. Here we see an irony of Plato in that he put forth his ideas of the perfect state poetically while the state itself would ban all poetry except perhaps a few trite nationalistic couplets. Thus the allegory shows conflicting implications of the ideal state which indeed reveal the mystical side of Plato.

Plato actually transcended himself in his writing, he wrote on a higher level than even he could perceive.

I would like to briefly go into the allegory itself as how I feel it to be after hearing Dr. Hunter.

The ideal state must be ruled by an elite force of philosophers. These philosophers will have come from one man who by some unexplained freak of nature was forced to leave the dark ignorance of his cave and go out into the open and eventually look straight into the sun. Afterward he will go back down into the cave and rule the rest. He'll never be able to urge all of

Storage Room Fire Sparks Excitement in North Dorm

Excitment struck Juniata campus late Saturday night. Some time during those late night hours, usually reserved for the beginnings of sleep or the endings of parties, the stillness of the night was broken by the ringing of the fire alarm.

Climbing out of bed from a sound sleep, in my case at least, I was immediately confronted by people running towards the doors. As my mind started to sharpen I realized that the hall was filled with smoke and not just blurred by the sleep in my eyes.

Outside, I discovered that the storage room in North had caught fire. While all the possibilities were dancing through my head, I was relieved to see the Huntingdon Fire Company show up and stifle the blaze. All in all it made for one of the most exciting Saturday nights on this year's calendar.

As smoke billows from the storage room in North Hall, students and firemen stand waiting for the blaze to be extinguished.

Recycling Center Open For Hunt. and Student Use

by Dave MacVeigh

The Recycling Center, next to the Pot Shop in back of Tussey-Terrace is the focal point of the Huntingdon Environmental Action Committee, headed by John Knouse.

According to Knouse, the Recycling Center handles newspaper, glossy paper, all colors of glass (green, brown, and clear,) and metal in any form (beer cans as well as food cans,) and brown bags and corrugated cardboard. The Center is always in need of volunteers to sort the material, and anyone interested should contact him at Box 1077.

"I strongly encourage anybody buying beer and soft drinks to buy returnable bottles. I have checked at the distributor's and all the major brands of soft drinks and beer come in returnables," he said.

Although a fair number of students are co-operating with the Recycling Center, says Knouse, "The amount of refuse that is actually recycled is only a small fraction of what the Huntingdon area produces; and newspapers are recycled on a proportional basis more than anything else. We hope to start a regularly scheduled collection in the future, so that much more can be recycled."

The Pennsylvania Game Commission plans to give the Committee 2,400 seedlings of different varities. These should arrive sometime in March with the stipulation that they be planted somewhere to give cover to wildlife, so the Committee is looking for suitable places.

Another planned activity is a big cleanup project during Earth Week in April. Public places such as Flagpole Hill, approaches to Route 22, etc., will be cleaned. The Committee will call for volunteers to do this. The Committee hopes to recycle the collected refuse, but isn't sure that this is feasible.

Long-range plans for the Committee include forming an educational group to educate the general public concerning the environment, and the formation of a subgroup of JC students within the Environmental Action Committee itself. Presently, the Committee is composed of JC students as well as townspeople.

The Committee is headed by a governing board of 8 members. Anyone interested in doing volunteer work other than at the Recycling Center is asked to contact Rex Morris at Box 1635.

Name Change

Each year our campus falls to the prey of evil minds. In the Spring of 1972, a group of bigoted free souls wished to change the name of our athletic mascot. To this nebulose group, the name Indians was unacceptable. To such forces, the name had to be free of racial connotation. Suggestions were sought, but to no avail. Members of the college were disturbed at such activities: all suggestions were unacceptable. We Are So Pure, that we gave up. Tradition won the battle of name changing.

Then the battle of truth began. Rumors as to why a fence appeared on the perimeter of the playground flew. One would think someone had died. But alas, the world of Juniata was set right. A brave crusading journalist searched for truth deep within the womb of the Athletic Department. And lo! it was revealed to us.

Truth and tradition have saved J.C. from not being able to sleep in on cold mornings. The concept of change was dormant; but, that is what every one thought. As most of the scholars at J.C. have found, change has arrived in the form of confusion. The total source of Knowledge has begun to play tricks on the mind.

This total source of Knowledge, the Library, is very metamorphic. At one time it was possible to use instinct and cunning to find books. The check-out desk was a modest size structure, nuzzled under the brow of a painting resembling John Wayne. A structure that was actually sleeping for eleven years, but then it grew. It was taking up more space than usual.

All at once, it moved — in the appropriate direction — out — doors — but due to indecision, it became a victim of the Hamlet syndrome; "To be or not to be." Where upon having a selection of three doors, it narrowed its escape to two — but alas — Desk could not make up its mind — for it took eleven years to get courage to move — Desk has placed itself between two doors and has shrunk in size. Who knows? In eleven years, Desk may move again.

When Desk began to move, the whole system followed suit — all the magazines made the decision to fortify the south end of the Library, chasing the reference section to the north. The books on the second floor went wild. They began to Unionize and now it's impossible to find books. For true users of the Library knew where their favorite section was, and we knew where our books were. . . besides isn't it part of a four year education at Juniata to learn only one system? But now it's all undone. We have to relearn where our books are located.

And to think Mailer was sharing the same location as Matthew, Mark, and Luke. . .

Now as we make obesiance to those who occupy the circulation chair of honor, we find that they no longer are the dispensers of wisdom and petty information that they once were. Now not only are they bereft of this knowledge, but it seems that some evil magician has bound them to their sacred chairs. So they sputter and suggest you try someone higher up than they. It would seem, O scholar, that in an enlightened age such as this: these practices should not exist, but alas in this Bastilion of Medieval Mediocracy they do.

To quote an anonomous scholar: "They (Libraries) are all screwed-up as they used to be; but they are all screwed-up in order."

With this we leave you — ponder in your hearts what has transpired.

Yours Faithfully,
The Independent committee of Name change now incorporating, Scholars for Stabilization.

Editorial

When I was recently named as the new editor of the Juniatian, I took a few minutes to sit back and think about some things I might do. My conclusion, although some may disagree, was that for a college this size, the Juniatian wasn't that bad a paper.

On the whole, I think we've reached the point where we are giving pretty good coverage to most things that are going on on campus. Admittedly, Juniata is not an overwhelming swarm of activity, but I think we've been reporting on just about everything that does happen. After all, this is the main purpose of a newspaper.

But after this, there still seemed to be something missing. Considering this, I come to another conclusion. Although the Juniatian was performing one major task, reporting the news, it was lacking in another area, namely, attracting readers.

So, after careful examination, I decided that my major concern as editor should be to develop methods of attracting readers to the Juniatian and keeping them interested. My goal as editor then, is to have just about everyone on the Juniata campus looking forward to Wednesdays when the Juniatian comes out. Wishful thinking, maybe, but at least a goal to work towards.

To head in this direction, I hope to attempt several things. First, I hope to have more editorials, both by members of the staff, and hopefully, some guest editorials. In response to this, I am also hoping for more letters to the editor. I really believe that people are always interested in what their comrades have to say. So, if you have any comments on the paper, or on anything about the college, or for that matter, on anything, write in and we'll print your letter.

Another thing that may be tried is the return of the Pro and Con column. I'd ask that anybody who might be interested in helping with this column, please contact me or anybody on the staff.

Right now, those are the concrete ideas, and along with a few in planning stage, they are what I hope will start us along the road to my goal. You can help too. If you think you'd like to be in on this, we can always use more people on the staff, and if you don't think journalism is your thing, at least read us and give us a chance.

CIVIL SERVICE

College seniors will have an opportunity to compete in the very popular Federal Service Entrance Examination (FSEE) when it is given on a walk-in basis at our campus on Saturday, January 27, 8:30 a.m. in Alumni Hall. Complete details and FSEE announcements are now available at the Placement Office.

Open to seniors and graduates in any academic major the program is appropriate for students in all curricula except Engineering, Physical Sciences, Accounting and a limited number of other technical fields. This examination is unquestionably the most popular avenue for Federal employment ever devised.

THE BIG HOUSE

by Richard Mettler

Barbara Streisand and Omar Sharif have done much more than initially meets the eye in Funny Girl. It is true that they have devoted their talents to construct a truly wonderful film but there is, I think, as much importance to the fact that Jewish Streisand and Arabian Sharif should be the two stars. Streisand outside of a stern reprimand from her aunt Rose and Sharif outside of having a Cairo magazine calling it "outrageous" made it through the film relatively unscathed.

Certain critics such as John Simon and writers like Truman Capote seem to think that actors and actresses traditionally possess somewhat of a lack of intelligence. I don't portend to know if this lack is due to their art, a pre-requisite for performing, or if it is true at all. I can see, however, why a critic or writer would claim more intelligence than actors and actresses for without this superiority their importance would severely decrease.

But be this as it may, I do believe that performers such as Streisand and Sharif possess probably a greater amount of basic goodness and a greater devotion to their art than do many writers and critics. A performer does his thing in front of people. They must face up to the public's estimation of their talent on the spot. But it's almost on the spot. But it's almost as if writers and critics and the such operate in the dead of night. They perform their task. attach their name or in some instances a convenient pen name, and if their work is received well they come out of hiding and go on Cavett or Carson. Of course I'm grossly exaggerating the faults of writers and critics and grossly over-extolling the virtues of performers. But perhaps this should be done more often by others to establish a balance between the two. The one inescapable fact is that performers should be given more credit for having to accept a more spontaneous reaction to their work than do people in many other arts. And this spontaneous, initial reaction is more likely to be permanent than that of a play, novel, or review. One is much more likely to give a reading a more fair and lengthy consideration than they would to a performance.

Streisand and Sharif must have had certain reservations concerning possible repercussions they'd encounter because of the political situation between their perspective nations. But that evidently didn't keep them from doing their best to share their talent with the world. If they do, as some would have, possess a lack of acceptable intelligence, we might say that discrimination and bigotry come about as a result of intelligence.

The company was ecstatic to find that Omar Sharif would be able to accept the part after all, that a previous committment was no longer withstanding. They were also pleased that he could sing as well.

Jay Stark, son-in-law of Fanny Brice, produced the film and originated the Broadway play in which Streisand also had the title role. Although she has had considerable experience in Broadway and other drama, to her "being a star is being a movie star".

Fanny Brice, who was Jewish, was the famous Baby Snooks on radio. As she progressed her fame grew until she became part of the ZiegfeldFollies where she became very close to Flo Ziegfeld. She married Nick Arnstein, Omar Sharif, a gambler by profession. As Fanny became one of the greatest stars in the history of the follies Nick began going downhill. He lost everything in a disastrous oil speculation and finally went to jail resulting from his complicity in an extortion. Their marriage ended as he realized that she would always be the star of the family and he would just be living off of her. The film actually makes Arnatein appear to be a more desirable character than he actually was.

If you're fortunate enough to experience Funny Girl pay close attention to the musical score and particularly to I'd Rather be Blue Over You and Don't Rain on my Parade. You won"t be able to help from catching the excitement and magnetism of the Ziegfeld Follies

Action Rep To Recruit On Campus

VISTA & Peace Corps to Recruit

College campuses were turned on eleven years ago. That's when Peace Corps, integral part of President Kennedy's new Frontier, was born. Four years later, VSTA was on the campus competing with the Peace Corps for volunteers.

On July 1, 1971, VISTA and the Peace Corps became part of the citizens service corps, ACTION. Their merger enabled VISTA and Peace Corps to combine their recruiting operation — a move which resulted in lesser recruiting cost and increased convenience to prospective volunteers.

Larry Dansinger, a VISTA-veteran-turn-recruiter, who will be recruiting here on Tuesday, January 30, stated "college campuses are still the main producer of volunteers and we particularly want to appeal to young people, and there is a huge untapped reservoir of them."

The representative will be in the Placement Office, 3rd floor of Founders. If you have other commitments that day you are encouraged to call Debbie Kooperman in Philadelphia at (215) 597-0744 for further information.

Shoemaker Displays Taylor Watercolors

by J. G. McDonald

There is a new art show at Juniata College's Shoemaker Galleries. It is a collection of some twenty-eight watercolors by Juniata College's own Barnard Taylor.

But if you expect to find watery pastel pretties, reject the notion immediately. These are paintings of strength and intrigue. They evidence a sensitive and hopeful vision.

One painting in particular was a moving experience for me. A landscape done in dark tones, in the main, its varied violet tones produce shifting visages of horror. Unlike most of his frankly two dimensional paintings, this has depth and horizon. There is a hopeful section of lighted blue above the somber foreground. Many of the works suggest an oriental influence with subtle juxtaposition of color, the placement of shapes and the obvious respect of line.

By now it should be obvious that this reviewer is not an art critic. I don't think you need be one to come away with certain feelings—that one has been in the presence of a unique artist, a sensitive spirit.

These abstract landscapes speak in a language of visual imagery. Or to put it in the words of the artist, "When I paint I'm writing, a writing that is an extension of the cave picture writing, exploring our visual reaction to the world. Visual art is made up of very simple elements learned from our experience of lines, forms and shapes."

During a short interview, Mr. Taylor made the distinction between mimetic art, that is an imitation of nature, and musical art, that is an abstract interpretation of nature.

His work is of the latter type. In it one discovers nuances of Klee, Miro and Picasso. Taylor combines vigorous technique, a youthful vision and over twenty years of experience, to create an exciting art. Experiencing it personally is something you won't want to miss.

Taylor, who is College Editor and Coordinator of Public Information at Juniata College, is currently completing work on his M.F.A. at Penn State University. He has over a dozen one-man shows and exhibitions to his credit, mostly in Pennsylvania and New York. His paintings are represented in ten private collections.

The present show at Juniata College's Shoemaker Galleries will continue until January 28. The gallery is open from 1 to 5 p.m. daily including Sunday.

Swimming Pool Available For Community Use

by Patrick E. Fleagle

The recently built Huntingdon Middle School offers Juniata students a unique opportunity to enjoy a commodity noticeably missing to our campus, a swimming pool. Mr. Gilfillan, principle of the Middle School said that although there is no Juniata night per se, the swimming pool is open to community adults Monday night from 7 to 9 P.M. and Juniata students are welcome to use the pool at that time.

Of interest to the groups and clubs on campus is the pool's group rental plan. Friday nights are reserved for groups and the rental price of $20 includes life guards and use of the pool from 7 to 9 P.M. Groups may obtain a rental application by contacting the office of School Superintendant, Mr. Binney, at 643-4140.

For those who need a senior lifesaving certificate for summer or other jobs, the Middle School is offering the senior lifesaving course. The course starts tomorrow night so those interested are asked to contact Mrs. Shirley Crownover, Secretary at the Smithfield Elementary School, at 643-2470. This should be done immediately to ensure one of the remaining class slots. Also, for those students who are non-swimmers there is a class for beginners meeting on Monday nights.

So if you want to be Juniata's answer to Mark Spitz or if you just want to have some fun, take advantage of the Middle School's swimming pool.

Post-war Era Theme Of Play Reaches Hunt. Comm. Theatre

"Born Yesterday", the next play to be offered by the HCT, is a political satire of the post-war era. It concerns the adventures of one Harry Brock (Howard Crouch), a struggling millionaire junk dealer, who has come to Washinton to buy a pet senator (Se. Norval Hedges, played by Lew Mermel). This, he believes, will keep the government out of his hair while he reclaims all of America's valuable junk which has been left in Europe because of World War II. His operating principles are simple— "Like you gotta get the other guy before he gets you." As with most people having money and a willingness to use force, he has little trouble with the government, and the protective legislation which Hedges has proposed seems to be quite likely to pass. Suddenly, a snag appears. In order to fit into Washington society Harry's mistress, Billie Dawn (Mary Ellen Treat) —an unsuccessful showgirl— has been learning proper English and manners from a local newspaper reporter, Paul Verrall (Bob Holmes). Gradually she realizes Harry's crudity and meanly grasping nature, whereupon she and Paul gather evidence against him — but are caught in the act. Do they get away? Does Harry kill them? Don't expect me to tell you; we need the money.

"Born Yesterday" was written by Garson Kanin and Ruth Gordon in 1945, and was first presented at the Lyceum Theatre in New York on February 4, 1946. It will be presented again at a more reasonable time, i.e., 8:30 on the evenings of February 8, 9 and 10 of the year 1973. This will occur on the stage of the Huntingdon Area High School, and will cost you $2.00 (or $1.25 if you're a student). Reservations may be made by calling George Kurtz (643-1024) anytime after Jan. 29. "Born Yesterday" is presented by courtesy of Dramatists Play Service, Inc., and is being produced and directed by Angela Lakatos. And may a good time be had by all.

Juniata College Student Government President, David P. Andrews, is participating in "A Conversation With the Governor," to be presented Friday, January 26, at 7:30 p.m. on WPSX-TV, Channel Three. A wide range of topics of both state and national importance will be discussed. Watch Friday evening!

his companions to leave the cave nor would he want to. All he can do is fan the coals in the minds of the few who will eventually leave the cave. He can't implant the coals or fan those that are cold.

The explanation for all those in the cave not rushing out is that the comfort and predictability they experience in the cave appears to be more desireable than the harsh realizations they'd encounter as a result of their enlightenment and freedom.

An important point made by Dr. Hunter is that the cave can be analogized as a tomb. And that tomb ironically rhymes with womb. From this we might be able to say that life doesn't begin until we leave the womb and that enlightenment doesn't begin until we leave the cave. Two final points made by Dr. Hunter is that an enlightened individual doesn't become enlightenment but merely one who has had an intense relationship with enlightenment, and that change due to enlightenment won't replace ignorance but that the new will add to and enhance the old.

Letter

the subject.

Today, in the Student Government administration of Dave Andrews, the Senators have gone on record as urging an end to the Vietnam War. It has also made several references to the abortion bill recently vetoed by Governor Shapp. While these actions are not new to college campuses, they have set what will hopefully be a reversible precedent.

Existing in an academic atmosphere, the Student Government should feel responsible to uphold academic objectivity and freedom of expression. By going on record on the problems of Vietnam and abortion, the Student Government has irreparably biased any objective thought which may take place on these subjects.

On September 15, 1969, a committee consisting of Kenneth Crosby, Ronald Lenox, Mary Elise Suffern, Jack Troy, and Charles Schoenherr presented to the college community a statement on the Rights, Freedoms, and Responsibilities of Students at Juniata College. In its preamble the Statement says that the transmission of knowledge and the formulation of ideas:

"... can only take place in an open and liberal atmosphere which encourages free inquiry and free expression among students as well as responsible critical judgement and an independent search for that which is most meaningful to the students.

In such an atmosphere, the student must assume the responsibility to secure and respect conditions which are conducive to the personal academic freedom of everyone."

By taking a stand on national issues the Student Government is not respecting the "conditions which are conducive to the personal academic fredom of everyone.

This is not to say that the Student Government should not take a stand on such issues as faculty evaluations and student services. These are indeed functions of the Student Government but they do not infringe on academic objectivity.

What then can students do about national altairs? It is only practical politics for a united group of students to achieve more than a single one could. This seems to be the function of the National Student Lobby of which we are a member. Through this media Student Goverment can reflect the opinions on campus without making academically injurious convictions.

Along with the NSL probably the most effective way of influencing opinion is through the student press. Although collective stands can and should be taken, most students newspapers have such stipulations as that in the Juniatian that "No article printed within (the Juniatian) necessarily represents the collective opinion of either the administration, faculty, or student body." This provision allows for maximum communication without committing an entire student body or endangering academic objectivity. Perhaps, Student Government would be wise to follow the same stipulation.

Accident Marred X-mas Vacation

by Ron Mowen

On December 15 students at JC were ecstatic about getting home for the Christmas vacation. Many had their cars packed the night before so they could leave the campus immediately after classes. The mixture of rain and snow offered a hopeful hint of a white Christmas but the prospect of a dangerous journey home.

Two of the JC students on their way home only journeyed 1.5 miles north of Huntingdon when the vehicle in which they were riding was demolished.

Sue Ellen Runyan, 20, Lairdsville, was critically injured and underwent emergency surgery for internal injuries at the J. C. Blair Memorial Hospital. The driver of the car, Stephen A. Bartholomew, 20, North Caldwell, N.J., suffered facial injuries. He was treated at the hospital and then released the following day.

Mr. Bartholomew was north bound on the Cold Springs Road 1.5 miles north of Huntingdon, when he lost control of his car on the slush-covered roadway. The car ran off the right side of the roadway and hit a Bell Telephone pole. Bartholomew's car was totally demolished.

Miss Runyan was released from the hospital on Dec. 24. She would like to publicly thank all who helped her and her parents during her stay in the hospital.

Juniata's Wrestlers lose their Last Two Outings on the Mat

Juniata suffered defeat in its last two outings on the mats, in a quad-meet at Gettysburg and at home against Lycoming.

At the Quad-meet at Gettysburg, Juniata wrestlers narrowly missed victory against Farleigh Dickinson and Kings Point, losing 18-15 and 21-18 respectively. Both meets went down to the wire. Against Gettysburg and Lycoming, the tables were turned. Gettysburg handed JC a 37-3 shellacing with Steve Oak getting our only win and Lycoming whipped JC 40-8; Jim McCartney pinned Lycoming's Scott Kedder and Steve Oak drew 3-3 with Wes Payne.

Coach Berrier feels our wrestlers will come out better the second half of the season. He plans a line-up change with John Seldomridge going at 142, Myron Zimmerman at 150, Geoff Clark at 158, Jim Ruoss at 167, Steve Ridisill at 177, Stan Packer at 190 and Kieth Jones at Unlimited.

Civil Service Exam Offered To Seniors

by Robert Lopresti

This Saturday a test is being given at Juniata College which will be of interest to all seniors who are considering applying for a job with the federal government.

The Federal Service Entrance Examination is going to be given in Alumni Hall Saturday, January the twenty-seventh from 8:30 to 12:00 in the morning.

The purpose of the test is to screen applicants for positions with the federal government. It is basically a math and verbal test. Any senior is eligible to take the examination without registering prior to the test, and without cost. However, Mr. Ronald Shunk, the Associate Dean of Students recommends that all seniors who are interested in the exam go to the Office of Career Planning, in Founders Hall. There, they can receive a booklet to explain the Entrance Examination in greater detail.

pier with two really good dinner choices instead of three of lesser quality.

Food Service: Many people eat the waffles etc. and it is hard to satisfy all tastes, but this will be looked into.

Students: When contract arrangements were made for the food service, we were promised that questionaires would be distributed in the fall, winter and spring to ascertain students food tastes.

Food Service: Our boss, who is presently ill, did not tell us.

Students: Also, how about a food service bulletin board where students who don't have time to talk to the management or come to food service meetings can air their complaints. This has worked well at other schools.

Food Service: Yes, this sounds like a good idea, if it is feasible. We may institute this if it can be arranged.

So this is, in general terms, how the Food Service Meeting stacks up. Dean Robinson, who was at the meeting, informed students that the meal ticket hassle was a college administration problem and not the Food Services. Changes are in the works for this system, possible an IBM sticker for each term to be affixed to the back of the student I.D. card to at least reduce the number of cards a student must carry.

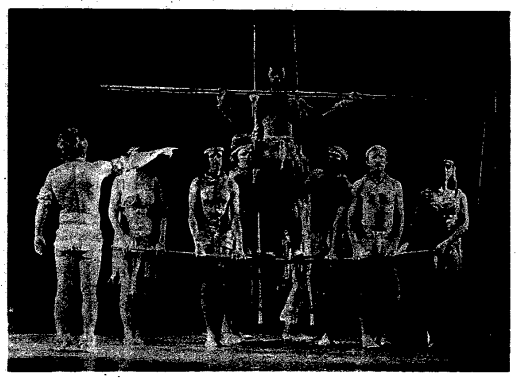
Deaf Company Dramatizes Gilgamesh in Unique Style

by Miriam Smith

Those persons who, out of curiosity, attended the performance of "Gilgamesh" last Thursday, anticipating something unusual from a company of deaf actors, were remarkably correct in their expectations. The National Theatre of the Deaf's dramatization of this ancient Sumerian epic was an extremely unique theatre experience. In addition to a skillful blend of the expressive beauty of sign language and the graceful precision of dance, the story of Gilgamesh's heroic quest for immortality is also told in a lively poetic narrative. Those performers deserving special acclaim were a passionately and powerfully played Gilgamesh, two thirds god and one third man; a fiercely eloquent Enkidu, man of the forest; Gilgamesh's seductively charming harlot; and a delightfully plump and lewd Ishtar, goddess of love. The striking, sometimes mesmerizing choreography, along with strange musical instruments, exotic costumes and clothes, and tall wooden rods as the only props, created the most extraordinary sound and visual effects—eerie, erotic, violent.



Actors from Theatre of the Deaf are portraying the making of a statue from the play "Gilgamesh."

J. C. Graduate Chuck Knox, Named Head Coach of Rams

by Robert Lopresti

The new head coach of the Los Angeles Rams is a graduate of Juniata College. Chuck Knox is in a head coaching position for the first time after ten years in the pros.

Knox was a senior and team co-captain in 1953, the first year that Juniata had an undefeated season. According to Tom McNeal, who was Knox's teammate and roommate, Knox was the team's best tackle, and the key to the team's defense. The defense gave up only thirty-nine points that year.

McNeal, who's son is on the Juniata team this year, says: "It couldn't have happened to a more deserving man". He describes Knox as a man of tremendous confidence, the kind of person who "could sell refrigerators to Eskimos".

After graduating Chuck Knox went directly into coaching. He was a coach here the following year, helping Juniata to it's second undefeated season.

He left then and spent four years as a coach in high schools. He worked as a line coach for Tyrone High School. Then he went to Ellwood City High School for his first head coaching position.

Knox's next job was at Wake Forrest College. From there he went to Kentucky, as an assistant to Blanton Collier, who later became head coach of the Cleveland Browns.

Knox's college speciality was defense, but when Weeb Ewbank hired him for the New York Jets he proved his skill at coaching offense. He stayed at New York for four years. Then Joe Schmidt of the Detroit Lions saw him and Knox worked in Detroit for six years.

Knox had now been coaching for almost twenty years, and had been with the pros for ten. There was a good deal of speculation that he would soon be a head coach for one pro team or another.

It was just last week that it was announced that the Los Angeles Rams had hired Knox to replace

4 Members of Student Gov't Visited D.C. For Inaugration

by Dana Ono

On a very chilly, but clear morning of Friday, January 19, four members of the Student Government, namely Dave Andrews, Jack Carton, Henry Siedzikowski, and Dana Ono battled the crowds that were headed for Washington,D.C.

The primary motives of the group was to see the headquarters of the National Student Lobby of which our JC Student Government is a member and witness the Inauguration of Richard M. Nixon.

Upon arriving in D.C., we tried to track down the National Student Lobby's headquarters. To our utter disbelief, the place which corresponded to the NSL address we had in our possession resembled a reasonable facsimile of a condemned building that should be demolished. We were expecting a fairly new building proudly displaying the NSL sign in some unique manner since the NSL was founded only about two years ago. The office consisted of a few desks cluttered with papers, files, pamphlets, and other assorted paraphernalia in a couple of rooms on the second floor. We did not show evidence of our amazement to the absolute aura of sloppiness that had confronted us, but instead, cordially introduced ourselves.

Although I am being a bit sarcastic of the NSL's physical atmosphere that the students work in, the actual work output that they do is really of an astonishing capacity.

After our brief visit to NSL, we decided to visit some Congressmen and Senators. We had the fortunate opportunity to catch Sentaor Mike Gravel (guest speaker at JC's Colloquy) who had just arrived from Alaska. In our chat with him, we found out that Senator Gravel was eager to speak again at Juniata.

The talks with some Congressmen proved extremely beneficial to our group. One of the most enlightening experiences of the trip was talking with Congressman Bud Shuster (JC is in his particular district) who gave us passes to the Inauguration and had pictures taken of him with us. He was also gracious enough to invite us to a luncheon with him and other Congressmen which, unfortunately, we could not attend due to a time element. People of importance whom we saw were Governor George Wallace, "Swop" Jackson, Mike Mansfield, Jacob Javitts, and others.

Friday night saw us staying overnight on the campus of American University. Talk which filled the campus that night was almost 100% political in nature. Many of the AU students were waiting in eager anticipation for the next morning which would find them demonstrating in various key locations in D.C. Others were heading for the Capitol grounds (like us) to witness the Inauguration and the other festivities planned for the day. One of the impressive things which we found in rapping with many AU students was their keen political awareness. This is probably due to a certain extent by the close proximity of AU to DC (Hmm. . .sounds like some vectors in n-space problem).

A bus ride and a transfer to a cab led us weary-eyed early Saturday morning to the Capitol grounds at around 930 a.m. We had standing room passes and as the minutes crept by, the cold weather also crept upon us. By 10 a.m., the four of us seriously considered if it would be worth the wait. Watching the Inauguration on television would have

by Rick Boyer

Last Saturday, January 27, the Center Board presented Gravel, a rock band from Pittsburgh, in Oller Hall. Gravel, currently under contract with Columbia Records, is composed of five members: Bob Corbin, lead singer and piano; Dave Hanner, guitar and vocals; Gregg Benedix, guitar and vocals; Mark Kamer, bass; and Terry Bates, drums.

Columbia, on their review sheet, calls Gravel a country rock band. However, I doubt whether that judgement would hold up after listening to them in concert. In fact, it is hard to identify Gravel with any particular strain of rock music. During the concert, I could hear echoes of the Grateful Dead, Quicksilver, Jimi Hendrix, the Byrds, Merle Haggard, and, of course, good old '50's rock and roll.

Generally, their original compositions focussed on and revolved around assorted kinds of ballads. I felt that the band's supposed country rock identity was best exposed during the first half hour or so. Here, the songs started with nice acoustic introductions that gradually evolved into storming crescendos. I liked it, not because it was anything new, but because it sounded so much like the Dead. Even the vocal harmonies were reminiscent of "Uncle John's Band" or "I Know You Rider".

The rock and roll medley, featuring parts of "Roll Over Beethoven", "Johnny B. Goode", "Blue Suede Shoes", and Jailhouse Rock", was what finally got the audience responding. Each section of the medley was pleasurable to hear and the guitar lines between the verses reminded me of Johnny Winter. "Okie From Muskogie", which opened the second half of the concert, was perfect. I thought the musicianship of this song revealed the essence of Gravel's country identity and, consequently, would serve as the focus of their music during the rest of the show.

I guess this is why I was so surprised upon hearing the closing number which consisted of a conglomeration of different songs (some original and some not) joined together by some very unoriginal guitar solos. This medley began with a freaky ballad about someone who "comes in at ten and is gone by three". The guitarists then launched into a lengthy solo which, at times, sounded like Hendrix, Jerry Garcia, John Cipollina, Jorma Kaukonen, and many other prominent rock guitarists of the late 1960's. After an absurd part called "Bullsht Boogie", Gravel finally brought the song back to that weird ballad. When the band said "thank you" and walked off the stage, I, like most of the audience, thought they were breaking between sets, but, alas, the show was over.

After seemingly accusing Gravel of a lack of originality and identity, I would like to say that I enjoyed the concert very much. Most of the bands I've seen play at Juniata focus mainly on Pop-40 type material. It was refreshing to hear Gravel. They very capably executed every song and never lost my attention.

Various Courses Offered During Summer School Sessions At JC

by Cindy Saczerba

It's only the beginning of the new year, but already plans are being laid for the summer session at Juniata. The registration week will be from April 30 to May 5. The application date for the new students is June 4, and there will be an application fee of 10 dollars. The registration for new students will be June 15.

A wide range of courses will be offered in the two summer sessions. The first session will run from June 13 through July 20. The second session will be from July 23 through August 29. Both sessions have three divisions — The Humanities, Social Sciences and Natural Sciences. Also a non-divisional section is included which will offer the Writing Program, HEH: Greek, and the Nature of Man I in the first session with only the Nature of Man II being offered in the second session in the non-divisional section.

A long list of the other courses being offered, ranging from English to sociology will be made available to interested students in the near future.

Everyone is interested in the costs so here are the fees. Tuition will be 150 dollars per unit. A general student fee will be 12 dollars each session. Included in this fee is a casualty insurance coverage. Room and board will be 190 dollars per session, plus 30 dollars extra if someone desires a room to himself. If a lab is required in a course, there will be a 20 dollar fee per session. Private musical instructions will also be offered. The cost will be 70 dollars for 2 lessons a week per session.

Information concerning the summer session can be obtained at The Registrar's office or from Dr. Donald T. Hartman, director of summer program.

A Christian Approach to Ecology

Saturday, Feb. 3, 1973, Professor Glenn Hart from Mansfield State College will be at Juniata. He is a professor of geology. He is planning to spend a full afternoon on "A Christian Approach to Ecology." Included will be a philosophical film entitled the "Worship of Nature," a study of God's Plan for ecology, and a "field trip" to observe and "learn" Christian ecology. Everything will start at 2:00 p.m. in Tote Lounge, and continue from there. Everyone is welcome.

EDITORIAL

by Henry Siedzikowski

In my constant striving to make the Juniatian a forum for student comment, I thought it might be interesting and productive to make some roaming comments from my perspective and put them out for any challenges.

One thing that interested me around campus was the reaction to the Student Government taking on current national and state issues. The negative reaction was stated quite well last week in a letter to the Juniatian. Despite the fact that I thought it was well stated, I strongly disagreed with it for several reasons.

First, I dissent on the charge that taking a stand in the name of the Student Government committed the entire student body to that position. I don't find that view logical. For instance, if the Student Government passed a resolution that Juniata should have only science majors, I, as a supposedly rational person, could not realistically see a mass evacuation of Good Hall. When a labor union or any other organization endorses a candidate, nobody expects all its members, or even a majority of them, will necessarily vote for that candidate.

Second, he says the Student Government is over-stepping its bounds in making a resolution not immediately concerned with the campus itself. As I see it, the purpose of a student Government is to look out for the student's welfare. As I interpret this, the student's welfare is not totally wrapped up in Juniata's campus. There is a world outside, that we all must go out and live in and it is in our interest that Student Government works to try and improve that world.

The final charge that I thought I should comment on, was the charge that taking a stand somehow endangers academic freedom. To me, this borders on the paranoic. I can see no way that a stand on an issue taken by any group on campus could realistically endanger inquiry into that issue. In fact, feeling I have some acquaintance with argumentitive minds, it seems a stand by one group tends to increase debate by competing factions. In this sense, the stand actually enhanced academic freedom.

For those of us who carried the dream of America's campuses crying out in a united voice against the injustices of society, it was like being Alice in Wonderland.

The event was the inauguration of the President of the United States. Dave Andrews, President of the Student Government, along with three Senators, Jack Carton, Dana Ono, and myself, had been invited down to Washington to attend this event by the National Student's Lobby.

Friday afternoon was spent visiting several Representatives and Senators. In each office, we were warmly received and treated as VIP's. It was a tremendous feeling to see how much respect these government officials showed for a few students. It was also greatly encouraging.

Among the dignitaries visited were Senator Mike Gravel and Congressman Bud Schuster of this district. Senator Gravel was very friendly, and said he would like to visit Juniata again. Congressman Schuster demonstrated a willingness to improve his relations with this campus. This was encouraging, considering the way he left after his visit during the fall campaign.

That night, we spent at American University. Although we were not down there for the protests, it was encouraging to see the tremendous interest in these activities by the American U. students. At least some campuses are still alive with political activity.

One final note, since this term is only five weeks from completion. It is our fervent hope that some adjustments can be made in the registration process, so the third term does not start with a major battle similar to those preceding the first two. With that thought, I bid adieu.

Until recently, there was hanging on the wall in one of the tutorial rooms fourth floor Flounders, a Guatemalan travel poster picturing an old ritual of bygone days when the Mayans had little to fear except the daily routine of pleasuring their gods with a token sacrifice.

On the poster a 'feathered' priest is standing before a sacrificial stone altar holding the lifeless carcass of some unlucky bird while a half-naked priestess kneels, head lowered, offering a bowl of mixed fruit. If memory serves, I think another figure is beating a fast retreat. All in all, a poster that warns you, Guatemala is a serious little country that once held greatness.

Leaving Oller Hall last Thursday evening after a two hour voyage back to the beginnings of Time, courtesy of "Theatre of the Deaf" and their epic vehicle "Gilgamesh", my mind wandered uneasily up those crucifying stairs in Founders and searched out again that hateful poster. Having learned to live or at least co-exist with an imagination that works overtime and delights in pestering, I dismissed the image and went home.

But unhappily, neither "Gilgamesh" nor nt has me alone. Since the gods reveal their thoughts in dreams and visions and everything, it seems, is a sign to us, one is left with no alternative, if one wishes to free the head for other thoughts, but to try to interpret said signs, at least to one's own satisfaction. Now, if you fall into the category of the type of individual who stops Christ on the way to Galgatha and snapping your fingers and flashing that winning smile, "Say, what's happening, Man?". . . . . well, go somewhere, stick another piece of gum in your mouth, and read the sport's page. But if you think there is more to this world of ours than is at first glance visible, stick around.

There are all levels of awareness and our problem always has been trying to balance everyone on the same seesaw. So, to the task at hand, not necessarily correct but inevitably the beginning of pain.

Mathematics may feed the mind and in truth be the foundation blocks of the Universe but it is Art that feeds the Soul, whether the Universe, the Nation, or the College. Without the viality of music, theatre, or painting and those souls who fire these kitchens, we have just the structure clean, abstract, and abandoned. Intellect comes in a sorry second to Pain, pain is the mother of Pleasure, and pleasure is the Four Poster of the intellect.

When the Arts program is neglected for any reason in an Institution of learning, that institution withers at it's source. Without a meaningful program for those leisure moments after study, not in the form of mindless entertainment, but where searching minds can go bathe in the eternal mysteries that equate with harmony and beauty, one either dies of boredom, is reduced to X rated movies, or (ah, here's the rub). one transfers to an environment where the extra-curricular activities are a joy to the heart, a delight to the mind, and expressive of the exciting age we are experiencing.

Two images crowd the mind. When Gilgamesh searches out his mother to question her concerning his dreams and the Goddess answers in a voice that the deaf actress has learned through mechanical rate, one is swept backwards to ancient Greece and chilled by what must have echoed the very voices

by Richard Mettler

"1776"

"I have had this Congress, for ten years King George and his Parliament have gulled, cullied, and piddled these colonies and still this Congress refuses to grant any of my proposals for independence, not even so much as the courtesy of open debate. Good God what in hell are they waiting for?" What enraged colonial citizen was that? It was John Adams delagate from Massachusetts and the abnoxious and disliked catalyst in the acceptance of the Declaration of Independence and the formal break from England.

The time was May, June, and July of 1776. The place was the chamber of the Continental Congress in Philadelphia. Things were going badly for George Washington and the Continental Army Loses were heavy, supplies were few, and dissertion was rampant, John Adams saw that if they were ever to beat the British it would have to be a unified effort of all the colonies. He made that his resolve.

1776 has been played on Broadway, in various other theatres across the country, and now has been made into a film. I saw the musical at the Valley Forge Music Fair which had a theatre of the round. This afforded a most unusual effect with the audience. In a theatre of the round the audience feel as if they are part of the performance. The actors come on and off stage by way of the aisles and at Valley Forge anyway they made their entroits and exeunts in such a way that the audience felt as though the acting was taking place all around them and not confined to one general area. Another interesting effect is the audience can see across the stage to the audience on the other side. Hence you are actually watching yourself watch the performance.

1776 has a very fine musical score with the most unique overture and finale that I have ever experienced. We learn from textbooks how great these men of the Independence were and how much they sacrificed for freedom. So I guess it's not difficult to think of them as being immortal. 1776 takes these men down from the pedestals of demigods and reveals them as being human. To me this makes them much more impressive. We all expect gods to do great things but when a mortal does something great we should be truly impressed.

More people gathered and the thought of a warm environment became evermore intense. At 10:30 a.m., still one hour before that infamous event, we had had enough. Walking numbly, we proceded out of the grounds against the influx of the incoming crowds. A $5.00 cabfare brought us back to American University where we jumped into the stationwagon and sped in earnest (?) back to JC by mid-afternoon.

We did accomplish one of our motives in getting acquainted with the NSL Coordinating Committee, but as for the Inauguration. . .

Kihl Delivered Paper At Appalachian S.U.

by Tim Reimer

Dr. Young W. Kihl, of the political science department, was at Appalachian State University in Boone, North Carolina last weekend to deliver a paper to The Twelfth Annual Southeast Regional Conference of the Association for Asian Studies.

The paper entitled, "Problems of Unifying a Divided Nation: A Theoritical Overview", deals with the unification of North and South Korea into one political unit. Dr. Kihl examines literature of international relations theory to find a practical application for use in regards to Korea. He proceeds in three steps: first, in the light of Korean experience an examination is made of the relavance of the theory of international integration; second, from the perspective of the functional approach to unification an analyzation is made of the current North-south interaction; and third, an examination of the alternative strategies of unification like neo-functionalism and federalism will be made.

This is the second paper Dr. Kihl has authored this year on the question of unification. His first paper entitled, "North — South (Korea) Relations: Unification", will be published as a chapter in the book, Major Powers and Korea to be released at the end of February. This chapter is a result of field work conducted by Kihl in South Korea. He interviewed government officials, intellectuals, and others in order to collect the appropriate data. He presented this paper November 10-11 at Western Michigan University for the Fourth Conference on Korea, Institute of International and Area Studies.

Dr. Kihl is preparing another paper for presentation to the Association for Asian Studies in Chicago during the month of March. Other future dates for presentations are tenative but Dr. Kihl hopes to fulfill an invitation to author a study for presentation in March also.

of the Delphic Oracles themselves. Again, when the goddess Ishtar, rejected by Gilgamesh, is persuading her father to create the "Bull of Heaven" to punish Gilgamesh, and to make her point if he refuses this request, she threatens she will go to Hell and summon up all the dead to plague the people, a cold spot at the end of my spine crept slowly up my back until it froze my mind with the idea that perhaps she has indeed carried out her threat.

I shook myself free of the thought and gave thanks for this excellent production, a roast beef for the soul, not the usual lifeless carcass thrust patronizingly towards us.

J.C.'s Tribe Loses Two B B Game Last Weekend

Juniata Drops Two to Wilkes and Scranton

by Tony Martuzas

Juniata's basketball team went to Scranton and Wilkes last weekend, only to bow to the Royals 88-66, and also to the Colonels 94-67. Both teams were very physical, and simply outplayed the Indians.

At Scranton, the cagers ran into early foul trouble. They did come back, but the tough Royal team wore them down and pulled the game out of reach.

Against the Colonels, Donnie William's sore back forced him out of the game and he was replaced by Gary Ober. The Wilkes Colonels shot 57% from the floor, and this physical team thwarted any comeback Indian attempts. A majority of the players felt that both teams weren't really that good, but, somehow Juniata came out on the short end.

Indians pick up win From Grove City

by Brian Clemens

For the first time in almost 2 years the Juniata Indians have put together back to back victories by embarrasing a poor Grove City team 84-65 last Tuesday a Memorial Gym.

The game was never in doubt as Coaches Swinderman's and Stainbrook's hoopstone had control of the situation from the very outset. However, it is still uncertain whether Juniata's defense was superior or Grove City's offense inferior since the visitors reportedly passed up easy shots.

The Indians had things their own way as they blazed the courts for 58% shooting eyes. Before Grove City got its dribbles straight, Juniata had jumped to a 31-10 lead (Thanks to the scoreboard and Bill Gennmann) and the rout was on as as the Indians posted their most impressive decision of the season. The team is now 4-8 while Grove City dropped to 3-6. Heaven help the 3 teams they beat.

Besides getting many lay ups to improve their shooting statis, the Indians found a new scoring sensation in sophomore Mike Kenealy who scored 18 points. Two other bright spots for the Indians was the left passing of sophomore Mark Jula and the awesome strength under the boards of Tim Tabor. Helping Kenealy with the scoring was Bobbie Carles — 16, Donnie William — 11 and Tabor — 10. The Indians play next over the weekend and let's hope this newly found winning streak continues to grow.

If you have been to the gym on a class night that an interscholastically scheduled activity was not in progress, you undoubetedly have noticed the bustle and spirit within the gym. Girl's BB Team On Wrong Side Of Whistle — Lose To Penn State Team, 23-22

by Tony Martuzas

Now 2-2 on Year

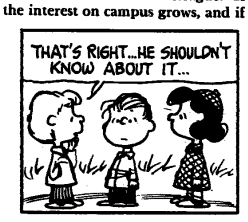
After four games, the Women's basketball team have won two, lost two. The last game was a defeat to Penn State (Altoona) 23-22, Which involved a controversial ruling by an official. The team called a timeout, and Sue Hutt proceeded to give the ball to the official. The ball slipped out of her hands and the official felt she did it purposely, so he called a technical: That technical shot decided the game.

Last year, the Women's Basketball team was 7-2 but, this year's team has better balance, they don't depend on just the five starting players, everyone conributes on this team. The starting five are Michele Campbell, Mary Ann Repman, Sue Rosshirt, Vernne Wetzel, and frosh Cathy Dickey. The other players are Leslie Whittaker, Ellen Valentine, Sue Hutt while the rest of the team is made up of freshmen: Elaine Becker, Sherry Dettmar, Kim Norris, Jacque Prentiss, Petra Theodos, Janet Mereincavage, and Barb Kosik. Coaching this year's team are Joe Lauver and Bill Landis.

Walt Nadzak, Director of Physical Education and Athletics, is exploring the possibility of entering a Women's Basketball League. If the interest on campus grows, and if a conference appears to be agreeable eligibility, comentents, dues, etc.), possibly the Juniata Women's Basketball team will be entered to compete in a conference.

There are four games remaining, so why not check the schedule posted in the Memorial Gym and watch them play on our home court.

The Juniata Girls' Basketball team takes a shot for the basket in the game against Altoona.



Ken Shirk Speaks For Lectureship

Kenneth L. Shirk, an attorney from Lancaster, will be the first speaker in the Juniata College G. Graybill Diehm Lectureship, February 5-6, 1973, Dr. Young W. Kihl, chairman of the Juniata political science department announced recently.

Shirk will be the first speaker under the G. Graybill Diehm Lectureship in political science which was established in 1972. The purpose of the lectureship was to invite a scholar or politician on an annual or biennial basis to lecture at Juniata for the benefit of the students, faculty and the community of Huntingdon.

A graduate of Washington & Lee University magna cum laude with a dual major in political science and journalism, Shirk earned his J.D. degree from the Dickinson School of Law. He was president of the Pennsylvania Welfare Forum from 1958-60 and won the Good Government Award, Lancaster County, and the Outstanding Jaycee of the World honors in 1960.

This year's topics include the role of party organization in local politics, local finance and tax reform, law enforcement at the city and county level, and reform of state and local government.

Chamber Music Concert Series To Be Given

The Music Department of Juniata College will again present series of chamber music concerts featuring well-known artists and faculty members. Guest artists this season will include; Jack Mall, trumpet soloist from Clarion College; Frederick Hand, a prominent young American guitarist; and Eleanor Lawrence, flutist from the Manhattan School of Music who is well known to local audiences from her frequent appearances here.

The series this year will differ somewhat from those in the past, in that two of the guest artists will appear several times while on campus. Frederick Hand, will present a clinic for guitarists and a coffeehouse concert on April 14, and will perform a chamber music concert, with faculty members, on campus the 16th of April and will repeat the concert in Altoona, where it will be sponsored by the College Alumni Association. Eleanor Lawrence will collaborate with faculty members in presenting a program of Baroque chamber music for the classes in Human Existence on Friday March 4th and will perform a different concert on the regular series on Sunday, April 6. Both concerts are open to the public, as are those by Mr. Hand when he is on the campus.

The opening concert of the season will be on Sunday, Feb. 25th at 3:30 in the Ballroom of Ellis Hall, and will feature Mr. Mall in a Concerto by Torelli for trumpet and strings, and an unusual Septet for trumpet, piano and strings by St. Saens, with Dr. and Mrs. King of the Music Department and members of the Altoona Symphony. Dr. William Russey will play French Horn in a rarely-heard Concerto by Haydn for flutes, horns and strings. Originally written for the King of Naples, who was an enthusiastic performer on the Lyra, a kind of hurdy-gurdy, this work will be performed in the alternate version which substitutes wind instru-

Kenelm L. Shirk Lectures On Reform In State An Local Government

by Dave MacVeigh

The first speaker sponsored by the G. Graybill Diehm Lectureship in Political Science was Kenelm L. Shirk. Shirk, a former Lancaster County Republican Committee Chairman, spoke about reform in state and local government Monday night in Alumni Hall.

Starting off his thought-provoking talk with the statement, "Reform . . . is that thing which I want and you don't," Shirk explained that, because of the major reforms that were made in the Pennsylvania constitution in the winter of 1966-67, "reform is over with."

According to Shirk, the reforms were directed at finance (taxation,) reapportionment (one man, one vote rule,) local government (increasing home rule,) and the judiciary system.

The major problem with taxation is the so-called Uniformity Clause, says Shirk. This prohibits taxing certain incomes at a different rate than other incomes. Citing an example of the need for reapportionment, Shirk said that Lancaster county has four judges, while Chester county has six, although Lancaster county has 50,000 more people. Municipal and county government are the two levels at which reform is best made, said Shirk. "We have the tools whereby the decisions may be made at the local level if the people are willing to make them," he added. In the days of the Korean war, said Shirk, "the military system had a better system to protect the rights of the individual . . . than we had in the civilian system . . . We also had an automatic review after a trial . . ."

Shirk stressed the need for reform throughout his talk. He emphasized that local government is "where you can really get into the action."

Inmates Accepted For On-Campus Study Program

by Patrick E. Fleagle

In an extension of a program started last year, two inmates from the Huntingdon Correctional Institute will be enrolled in Juniata College classes spring term. According to Robert Lakatos, head of the inmate program, success in an in-prison classroom situation has allowed the program to be extended to permit inmates to take on-campus classes.

Two inmates will be selected from a group of approximately twelve men who have successfully completed the in-prison program. The participating inmates will be carefully screened and will probably be picked from those inmates already on the furlough system, a program that allows extended weekend visits to the community on an honor system. According to Lakatos, there will be other considerations in the selection process including an assessment of the inmate's motivation for full time educational experience and an assessment of those who can be helped most by the on-campus experience. The men selected will have just a short time left on their prison term and will be near parole so that their education can be extended after parole if the inmate so desires.

The on-campus program will be supported by Federal money granted through the Governor's Justice Commission. The inmates will be classified as special students since the Juniata program is only designed for a one or two term experience.

Allhough last year's in-prison program was limited by a tight budget, 24 out of 43 participants successfully completed the course Introduction to Psychology in an April to July term. Several different courses were taught in a September to January term including Ecosomic Problems, taught by James Lakso, and two psychology courses, Introduction to Psychology, and Personality, both taught by Robert Lakatos. Thirty-one out of forty-four participants successfully completed courses taught in the September to January term. The in-prison program is still in operation and 75 people, including 6 prison employees are taking part. Fees and books are provided for inmates while employees pay a nominal fee and book costs.

The prison-college experience is not without precedent. Lakatos cited the Associate Degree program now in operation at Western Penn Correctional Institute under the auspices of Allegheny Community College and the Governor's Justice Commission.

Commenting on follow-up studies of the program, Lakatos stressed that the year-to-year basis of the Juniata program severly limits any thouroughly conclusive study on the effects of the program. However, he did state that the Carnegie-Mellon Institute has instituted a 5 year, $100,000 study of the cor-

Coradetti Hailed by Outstanding College Atheletes Hall of Fame

by Tim Reimer

The 1973 Outstanding College Athletes Hall of Fame has named Juniatian Joesph L. Coradetti a member for his performances in football and track. This honor carries with it inclusion of his biography, athletic achievements and picture in the 1973 volume of the Outstanding College Athletes of America.

In football, as a defensive back, Coradetti established a single season record with 9 interceptions in the 1972 season. With a career total of 17 interceptions he is one short of the Juniata all time mark. Coradetti was named to the Eastern College Athletic Association Division II All Star team for his November 4, 1972 performance against Western Maryland. At the end of the season he ranked ninth in national college division ratings with an average of at least one interception per game. His play last fall also won him a first team selection for the Middle Atlantic Conference as a defensive back.

The Juniata record in the 440 intermediate hurdles is held by Coradetti with a :54.3 timing. The recepient of the 1972 J. Foster Gehrett Award for most valuable performance in track, also teamed to mark records in the 440 and mile relay races. Coradetti also competes in the long and triple jumps. Three times during the 1972 spring season he was named to the ECAC Division III All Star track team, one as a first stringer and twice as a honorable mention.

Joe Coradetti was honored for his outstanding football record this year and his name was placed in the Outstanding College Athletes Hall of Fame.

"Bed, Barnyard, and Bush" To Be Presented February 8&9

by J. G. McDonald

Dr. Esther M. Doyle will direct her Readers Theatre class in an arrangement of Chaucer's Canterbury Tales entitled, "Bed, Barnyard and Bush." Dr. Doyle, Charles A. Dana Supported Professor of English at Juniata College, is being assisted with the direction by Clayton E. Briggs, head of the Speech and Theatre Department at Juniata College.

Dr. Doyle is the co-editor of "Studies in Interpretation," a recently published book on the oral interpretation of literature.

Readers Theatre is a theatre of the mind where the audience is asked to participate with the reader/actors. The audience must use its imagination to envision the action being described. The production of "Bed, Barnyard and Bush," she commented, "is a combination of the more common dramatic and the unique reader's styles of theatre. It will be a sort of story theatre," she said. She stated that the Canterbury Tales was not written for the theatre and so the emphasis in "Bed, Barnyard and Bush" will be on the language and imagery and not on visual enactment.

Dr. Doyle said that she chose to do Chaucer because his people are so eternally alive; because the characters, for instance the Wife of Bath and the Miller, are larger than life. She continued saying that Chaucer deals with the fundamental foibles of man—lust, greed and trickery but always with great humor and sensitive insight. She said that she had selected for this show the Pardoner's, Nun's Prient's and Reeve's tales because they are among the best known and because they are contrasting types.

"Bed, Barnyard and Bush" will be performed at Juniata College in Oller Hall on February 8th and 9th at 8:15 p.m. There is no charge for the event and the public is cordially invited to attend.

Penn State Running Nite School At J.C.

by Rob Lopresti

Penn State is running a night school at Juniata College for the people of Huntingdon County.

According to Dr. Wilfred G. Norris, Provost of Juniata, the night school is being run by the continuing education department of Penn State's Altoona campus. Such schools are being held by the University in other places around the state.

The program is aimed at people who aren't college students. The object is to let them take college courses, thereby earning credits, and seein if they are interested in attending college. If anyone does well there, and wants to go on Penn State or Juniata College will entertain applications from them. The credits earned in night school would also be transferable to Juniata.

Dr. Norris says the courses offered are college-level introductions to a variety of subjects. Two are offered during a term for a total of six a year. At the present "United States History since 1865" and the

by Henry Siedzikowski

A short time ago, the cease-fire agreement was signed in Paris. With that signing, Richard Nixon usurped the issue that in the 1960's, had drawn the campuses into the political arena. Now, if college youths want to stay politicized they must find a new issue or issues to unite around.

There are some who are trying to do it, by trying to continue anti-war sentiment with criticism of the cease-fire agreement. They argue that Nixon's "honorable peace" is not really honorable, and not really a peace. This is a highly debatable question with good argument on both sides, but it is not really an issue.

So where do we turn. Well, President Nixon, in his infinite goodness, has supplied several possibilities with his recent moves.

The big one came in his budget message. He wants to cut off funds to aid students in acquiring an education. Here is an issue that hits home. I am sure that a large number of students here are at least partially dependent on federal funds to pay for their education. If Congress allows Mr. Nixon to have his way, many of those who are dependent can expect less aid. That's something to consider.

There are other issues as well. With Mr. Nixon's recent arracks on the press, it seems at least a fair possibility, that a free press as we know it today, could become extinct. This may seem far-fetched now, but when you consider some of the things that have happened recently, you realize you can't put this issue too far out of mind.

There are loads of this type of thing. Mr. Nixon has shown a willingness and desire to do some substantial tampering, not only with the world we live in now, but also with the one we will live in, in the years after we graduate.

So, in essence this is a place for college students here, and everywhere, to stay interested, informed and involved. If we don't, we've got everything to lose.

At a recent Juniata Communications Board Meeting the subject of student complaints about campus media was brought up. A general lack of knowledge on how a student can make a suggestion or complaint about one of the four student media on campus was revealed. A general policy was adopted by the Board which should allow effective airing of student complaints about either The Juniatian, Alfarata, Kvasir, or W.J.C.

If you should find something wrong with a medium on campus, followed: 1) Talk to the media head (either editor or station manager) the following procedure should be about your complaint. This is the easiest step to take and should satisfy most of the complaints. 2) However, if the medium head does not satisfy your complaint, talk with the Chairman of the Communications Board, David Baer. Your conversation will be kept in strictest confidence. If by chance the problem is severe enough, the entire Communications Board will take action on the complaint.

Perhaps it would be expedient at this point to explain the origins and workings of Juniata's Communications Board. The Board was established several years ago mainly to protect the rights of the communications media on campus and to ensure a responsible and free form of information. Until last year the Board was largely ineffective, but by the efforts of several interested persons, it has acquired a workable constitution and a strong base for action.

The Communications Board consists of The Juniatian, Alfarata, Kvasir, and W.J.C. Its voting members include the editors and station managers of the media and their advisors. Also included are the Chairman, appointed by Student Government, and the Dean of Student Affairs, seated in an ex-officio capacity.

Several seasons ago, on a particularly dreary, rainy Sunday morning in New York City, I gathered up my children and leaving the wife to cope with her weekly visit from her mother, went for a bus ride up Fifth Avenue. It was an established pattern of behaviour for the kids and me to thus use our Sundays to search out new and strange places to explore in that greatest of all possible cities. Also, we avoided the sharp eye and critical tongue of the maternal grandmother whom we displeasured by the unalterable fact of our very existence.

The children were a delightful mixture of several races, Welsh, American Indian, Italian, and Jewish and though aware of the Church and Temple, had never been introduced to organized religion. However, being treated as adults since birth, (in New York it is difficult for a child to remain naive) they were completely intrigued with any thought that aided one in the continuing problems of survival, daily, here, or hereafter. So, we rode the bus for awhile, then, around 43rd Street, we disembarked and walked for a block towards Times Square, passing a building called Town Hall. During the week, this auditorium is rented out to various souls who have arrived at a point in their lives where they wish to be exhibited and reviewed according to professional standards and so rent the Hall and for a few brief moments strut their stuff or sing or do whatever is their Thing and start or end careers. On Sunday morning, the Hall is rented by the Church of Mental Science and a lecture is given by a Mr. Raymond Charles Barker founded in their beliefs.

It had started to pour when we had gotten off the bus and as a shortage of immediate cash curtailed any idea of escaping into a movie and as the lecture was about to begin, we took a quick vote and decided to chance the lecture. Experience had taught us to find seats in the balcony on such occasions just in case we needed to beat a hasty getaway from boring monologists (New Yorkers are very impatient listeners).

As soon as we were seated, a dappy little stout man name amiably out onto the stage and for the next hour rhanged our whole way of looking at life with such delightful information that even now, not a day goes by, but that my actions are not influenced by something that was said that rainy Sunday morn.

Based on the idea that Thought is the creative force of the Universe and is the one process that is not bound by Time or Space, he proposed the theory that we control our universe in microcosm by our daily thought much as Universal Intelligence controls the Universe in macrocosm by Divine Thought.. man was made in the image of God. .in essence has the same creative power as God. .through the use or mis-use of his though processes.

If there is anything wrong with your life, you are the one responsible. If you wish to change your life, change your thoughts and it will inevitably follow that conditions surrounding you will change to reflect this new thought. No one else is responsible for your happiness, but you. Thoughts are boomerangs who never fail to return in full measure and clothed in material concreteness to their masters. Mr. Barker said a lot of other things during that hour, but one thing

DISCUSSION

by Rick Boyer

Just the other day, Jim Hunter, News Editor of the Juniatian, came to me with an idea. A staff of two or three reporters would be created with the intent of reviewing record albums. Each reporter would concentrate on discussing his own favorite type of music. The members of the staff would alternate weekly, so that, in one issue, a rock album would be reviewed while the next issue could feature a review of classical music. Since I am interested in rock music and enjoy writing on the subject. I offered my services as a member of the staff. My specific job will be reviewing only rock albums.

Now, with the preliminaries set down, lets take a look at "Shoot Out at the Fantasy Factory". This new album is Traffic's eighth, and marks almost their fifth year in existence. After listening to it four times, I am inclined to say that the numerous personnel changes that have plagued Traffic surely have taken their toll as far as the musicianship on this album is concerned. Since the release of "The Low Spark of High Heeled Boys", their last album, more than a year ago, Traffic has replaced Rick Grech and Jim Gordon with Roger Hawkins and David Hood.

I am not saying that the musicianship is bad. In fact, its flawless. However, most of the cuts suffer because of dullness and repetition. Since there are only five songs on the album, they are, in most cases, most evident in "Roll Right Stones unjustifiably long. This problem is most evident in "Roll Right Stones", a thirteen minute Winwood-Sapaldi tune which "closes" side one. This song is comparable to the title song of their last album in instrumentation and length. However, while "Low Spark". . . churns along and develops nicely, making the listener wish the song never ended. "Stones" goes nowhere. The Chorus line is repeated vocally and instrumentally throughout the last half of the song as if Traffic needed to fill in some empty record space because of a lack of other material. The beginning of "Stones" is really beautiful, though, and the song is able to sustain itself nicely during its first five or six minutes.

The best cut is easily "Evening Blue". It features a very pretty acoustic guitar introduction. Gradually, the organ and percussion enter and add driving rhythum elements to the song. The break in the middle is supported by a brief but nice Chris Wood sax solo. Jim Capaldi's lyrics (eg. "If I had a lover whose heart was true, I wouldn't be alone in this Evening Blue.") are, as usual, excellent and blend in perfectly with the mood of the song.

The title cut is the probably the most anti-Traffic song they have recorded in recent years. It's a bouncy tune containing sparse instrumentation (just guitars and a barely discernable flute) and a powerful percussion section. But it also continues with merely a repetition of the guitar and vocal lines.

Communications

Although the Board was originally conceived as a protective device against possible censorship, it now deals also with budgetary problems and serves as an open forum for both inter- and intra-media problems. Board meetings are held the first Wednesday of each month and, except for executive sessions, are open to all.

If for any reason a student feels that an editor or station manager is not doing a sufficient job or has over-stepped his bounds, there are provisions for impeachment in the Communications Board Constitution. Any student can bring about impeachment proceedings by presenting a properly documented charge to the Communications Board. The media head will then receive due process and be removed if so warranted.

The Communications Board can and will take steps to remedy any complaints you have about campus media. If you have a complaint or suggestion which you feel would improve communications on campus, feel free to talk with the Chairman or any member of the Communications Board. However, since the individual media have more knowledge and experience, it might be wise to let them know what you specific complaints are. If they cannot handle your complaint, they at least can and should explain to you why its impossible to act on your suggestion.

"Writing of Ideas" are being taught. In the Spring "Effective Speech" and "Basic Problems of Philosophy" will be given. For any of these to actually take place there must be at least a minimum enrollment reached.

According to Dr. Norris Juniata College's only involvement in the program is providing facilities for the classes, which it considers a service to the Huntingdon community.

Dr. Norris also said that Juniata has in the past considered running a night school. However, they didn't feel that enrollment would be high enough to make it financially justified. He points out that Penn State has state support and therefore can offer the night classes at a lower tuition than Juniata College could.

The Penn State night school, then, hopes to give people who are not college students a chance to see whether college classes are what they are looking for, while learning, and earning credits at the same time.

Christianity

Christianity is not a Religion

Chris McFarland

Once a person becomes aware of his need for God, a search to fill this inner longing begins. Most men rationalize this inner longing and sublimate it into something their minds can deal with more easily. Other men are a little more honest with themselves, these become very religious. Religion is the invention of men to reach God. New religions are springing up everyday, evolving out of the thought processes of man himself. Everyone asks his friends and his neighoors in those rare heart to heart talks, How do I get to God?, What is necessary for me to do in order for me to reach him?. Religion tries to help the adherents become acceptable to God through some form and combination of character development, knowledge, and good deeds or works, but unfortunately religions fall far short.

Christianity is not a religion, although for almost two thousand years men have tried to make it one. Christianity, more specificly born-again Christianity, is God's way or plan to know God, God has said it is the only way to know him! Christianity is so often very illogical and full of seeming contradictions, yet it works, not because of what men bring to it but because of what God is. God does all that is necessary; men simply must be honest and sincere with God about what each man is individually. There are some real secrets in coming to know God in a personal way, I could tell you but then you would think it was my own personal belief. The next time you pray to God, ask him about it and don't stop asking until you get answers and you are aware of God in a way you never thought was possible.

really stayed with me. Someone in the audience inquired about what does one do when one meets someone who is extremely unpleasant and no amount of "good thinking" seems to have any effect on their personality. Mr. Barker thought for a few seconds then replied, "smile quickly and get out of their way!"

As we left the lecture hall and continued towards Times Square and the possibility of a round of hot dogs and orange juice for everyone, my son shugged his shoulders and said, "we do that all ready". "What", I asked? "Smile and get out Grandma's way", he answered. The truth was, though she didn't know it, we all rather really loved her. In her own way, she was very theatrical and by nature, New Yorkers love Theatre.

Al McBride Giving One Man Show At Shoemaker Galleries

by J. G. McDonald

Alexander T. McBride, assistant professor and chairman of the art department, is giving a one-man show at Shoemaker Galleries on the Juniata College campus. The show is of McBride's most recent work and includes 12 paintings and 10 photographs.

McBride employs a "knowledge of familiar spaces to create an ambiguity of forms in his paintings. His ideas based on his background in figurative, still life and landscape motifs, result in plastic tensions within the canvas, giving the observer a variety of spatial impressions that often cause backgrounds and foregrounds to appear to alternate." McBride said that his current work is "a kind of color impressionism that attempts to produce something of a strong presence reflecting his concern for space and light." He haid that "developing a sense of the poetic, a sense of how color excites or at least affects the emotions" is of primary importance.

McBride received his B.F.A. from Rhode Island School of Design and his M.F.A. from Cornell University. He has participated in over a dozen exhibitions including Four different sports are currently being played in ten tournaments: basketball has three league tournaments, volleyball has men's, women's, and co-rec. tournaments, handball has three tournaments (singles, doubles, and team), and paddleball has a ladder tournament. Another IM activity, although it's not a tournament, is skiing. The IM office also had planned for IM wrestling, but so far insufficient interest has been shown. If more interest is shown, a tournament may still be developed.

Coach Berrier Shows Optomism of Record

Wrestlers Yearn for Victory

After eight consecutive losses a coach can feel pretty low. Bill Berrier of Juniata keeps looking forward to that first victory. He can almost taste the anguish of his squad.

Through the eight matches, Jim McCartney's performance at 126 pounds has been a positive aspect of an all-but-lost season. McCartney, the fourth place finisher in the Middle Atlantic Conference meet a year ago as a junior, has a 6-2 won lost record and owns two falls. Mark Salisbury at 118 is the only other Juniata grappler with a winning record, a 4-3-1 mark.

Juniata goes after Shippensburg Wednesday in a non-league encounter on the Blue and Gold mats. Whistle time is 730 p.m.

Chris Wood's composition, "Tragic Magic", is a highly complex instrumental that is really nothing special. It fails because, again, it contains no kind of interesting musical development.

It is rather ironic that such fine musicians as Steve Winwood, Jim Capaldi, and Chris Wood could release an album as mediocre as this one. It seems as though most of the major rock groups that reached the peak of their popularity during the late 1960's and somehow have managed to survive into the early 70's are producing really poor albums. Maybe the title of the last track, "(Sometimes I Feel So) Uninspired", on Traffic's new album explains this trend.

relation between such college programs and inmate recidivism. Lakatos felt that such a study of Juniata's program would be a somewhat wasteful duplication of effort but said that there will be a short term study of the program to include such things as changes in self-esteem, changes in outlook, and the impact of the program on conflict within the correctional institute.

This month, the two men selected for the on-campus experience will be brought to the campus to meet students and become familiarized with the campus. Several students will be selected to provide an informal "reception committee" to help assimilate the inmates and give them a feeling of what the campus is all about.

Although there will be no campus summer program, it will resume in September. According to Lakatos, if the program is successful and additional funds permit, the program may be expanded to six people next year.

four one-man shows. He won first prize at the Central Pennsylvania Festival of the Arts in 1970 at State College.

The exhibition will continue until February 28. Juniata College's including Sunday from 2 to 5 p.m. The public is cordially invited to attend.

Juniata's Hopes of MAC Playoffs Dim With Losses

Juniata's chances of playing in the Middle Atlantic Conference Northern Division playoffs were dimmed last weekend in a two-day trip to Scranton and Wilkes-Barre.

A pair of conference losses left the young J-men with a 2-3 league mark with such tough powers as Albright and Philadelphia Textile still to be met. The 76ers are 4-10 on the season as coach Jack Swinderman bides his time while his rebuilding continues.

Robbie Carles, a 6-0 guard from Altoona, leads the freshmen dominated team in scoring with a 15.7 average while Don Williams, a 6-5 forward from Wilkinsburg at 14.1 and Tim Tabor, a 6-4 center from Niles, Ohio at 12.2 are close behind. You have to go four deep in the scoring figures to find a non-frosh in Mike Kenealy, a sophomore, who owns a 7.3 scoring average. Six of the top seven Juniata scorers are first year players.

A non- league contest at Lycoming Wednesday is the final road game for Juniata prior to a seven game home stand, four of which are MAC contests.

"Musical Trickery And Deceit" Given

by Rick Boyer

Last Saturday, February 17, Center Board presented Coffeehouse with Frank Digovanni. Frank currently a student majoring in music here at Juniata, provided a unique musical performance; a welcome deviation from the usual Coffeehouse billing.

The title of the show was "Musical Trickery and Deceit". Upon seeing this title, I immediately thought we would be confronted with some music originating from a moog synthesizer or some other kind of sound manufacturing technique. In essence, I was partly right. Part of the music Frank presented wasn't live. In most of the songs the entire rhythm sections, including drums, bass, and even backup vocals, were prerecorded and played back while Frank played the lead instrument, and sang, live.

I don't mean to sound derogatory though. Lets face it; when most people think about this idea, they react unfavorably, saying that the musician is incapable of supporting himself using just one instrument. Admittedly, this was also my first reaction. However, after seeing Frank's performance, I hereby take back everything I've ever thought or said that criticized this concept. Frank is an excellent musician, fully capable of performing with a solo instrument and without the aid of the recorded rhythm section. Furthermore, all of the instruments that were contained in the recorded parts were played by Frank and recorded individually, and then rerecorded together on one tape.

As to the individual songs, they were all beautifully executed. Frank is a very eclectic musician, able to play a huge variety of material. The music he presented ranged from quasi-jazz, as exemplified in the show by Van Morrison's "Moondance", to standard folk and love ballads ("Highway Song" and "Darlin' Be Home Soon"), and back to good old rock and roll. He even included a couple of Bob Dylan songs in his program. Frank's own compositions generally show and I believe he said this, a strong Leon Russell influence. An obvious exception was one of his songs (I regret that I don't know the title), that sounded like something Traffic might do.

Overall, it was a very enjoyable three hours. Frank Digiovanni is a very talented and innovative musician, and was well prepared to express his musicianship. The relaxed and inviting atmosphere of the show was enhanced by his warm and friendly rap sessions with the audience. More power to him.

Scenes From "Canterbury Tales" Enacted By Reader's Theatre

by Sam Sirianni

The Juniata stage was aglow with a colorful and vivd presentation of Geoffrey Chucer's Canterbury Tales. The Bed, Barnyard, and Bush which were the selections taken from these ageless tales were skillfully done by Reader's Theatre under the masterful direction of Esther M. Doyle and Clayton Briggs.

Now what is Reader's Theatre? As Vicki Harris describes, "Reader's Theatre is not a substitute for conventional theatre, and it is not intended to be. It is a different form with focus on the written word. Its source is all literature because it is new. There are still no "rules" for Reader's Theatre. Scripts are carried because it is the text and words that are important. The readers are not actors portraying the story for you, but interpreters sharing the literature with you.

No one member of the cast outshone the otherwise bright and talented crew. Each person in the show took on his or her task of sharing this great work with the audience gracefully as well as tastefully.

The fantastic acting, the lovely costuming, and the timely music all add up to a wonderful evening in merry-old-England. Lucky are the the ones who caught a glimpse of the performance, for those who did not lost out on an eventful evel

Cornell Poets Read Works At Shoemaker

by David Grotyohann

Two young poets studying at Cornell University will be reading their own works in Shoemaker Galleries on Thursday, February 22 at 8:15 p.m. The program has been scheduled by Dr. Esther M. Doyle, Chairman of the English Department here at Juniata College.

Gary French and Lynn Shoemaker, the two poets are skilled in creative writing of all types with an emphasis on poetry. They are expected to arrive approximately at noon on Thursday and hope to attend Mr. Fisher's 1:00 p.m. lyric class in either room G216 or G220.

The poets will be available for questioning by interested students. Students wishing to talk with them should contact Jim McDonald, Box 231, who is acting as escort for the poets.

Freshmen Seminar Strikes Again; Brings Oz to Life

by Jim Hunter

When the word "Oz" is mentioned, our natural thinking leads us down the yellow-brick road of Judy Garland, Toto, the wicked witch, the flying monkees, and all the little Munchkins. All this takes us back a few years, and instills a child-like innocence, long since gone. But last weekend, the freshmen seminar of Mrs. Goehring brought back the wizard, Dorothy, the scarecrow, the tin woodsman, and a host of others. The Patchwork Girl of Oz, an off-shoot of the Wizard of Oz, was performed by the seminar last Friday and Saturday, and many people walked away a bit younger than when they entered. On Friday, Huntingdon area students grades one through five attended the performance. On Saturday children at college laughed at the yoop, the woozy, and other characters not portrayed in the Wizard of Oz.

The play provided students and residents of Huntingdon with a break in the monotonous days of winter. But more than that, for one hour of one afternoon, it made me young again, what more can I ask?

Students to Vote on New Student Gov't Constitution

by Patrick Minnick

It is very possible that the next time you cast your vote for student senator that you'll be able to vote for someone other than a member of your own graduating class. Why? Because sometime in the not-too-distant future, a new Student Government Constitution will be coming up for ratification by the student body. (ratification will most likely take place through the Resident Assistants, each R.A. polling his or her hall). and part of the change will be the elimination of student senators who represent their own class. Instead, they will be representatives of the whole student body. An exception will be each incoming freshman class because they will not be here to vote at the time of the Student Government elections in the spring. As Article V Section A of the new S.G. Constitution states, "The Student Senate shall consist of the executive., eleven Senators elected at large from the student body, and three freshmen to be elected by their class."

The new constitution places more responsibility on the individual student senator than he or she had in the past. Now, in addition to being a member of the Senate and attending it's meetings, a student senator must be a member of and take part in the activities of one of the four Standing Committees of the Student Senate. These Standing Committees will deal with these topics: Budget and Management, Residential Life, Institutional Research, and Student Concerns.

Another interesting facet of the new document is the proposed elimination of Men's House and Women's House. In their place will be Dormitory Government which will consist of a president and vice-president elected by the student body as a whole, one representative from each tower of East Houses, and one representative from each hall of each dorm.

Move-up Day, the day in the spring when the newly elected Student Government Officiers take charge will be changed from the middle of May to mid-April by the new constitution. This clause was written in to give the incoming officers a chance to learn the ins and outs of their positions while the old officers are still available for consultation by the novices.

Chamber Music Series Features Trumpet Soloist

The opening concert of the 1972-73 Chamber Music Series, presented by the Music Department of Juniata College will be held in the Ballroom of Ellis Hall on the college campus Sunday, Feb. 25. Guest Artist for this concert will be Jack Nall, on the faculty at Clarion College, who will be heard in two works featuring trumpet. Mr. Nall has had wide experience as a trumpet soloist, and has studied with some of the most prominent teachers in the country. Recently, he has appeared with the Altoona Symphony as solo trumpet in several virtuoso parts for Baroque trumpet in the works of Bach.

The trumpet is not ordinarily found in chamber music ensembles, unless it is a part of a work for brasses, but an unusual composition by St. Saens, a Septet, combines trumpet with piano concertos and several virtuoso pieces for the violin, but his characteristic elegance, wit and light, almost popular style are to be found in even in this less pretentious piece. The trumpet will be featured in a more soloistic role in a Sinfonia by the Italian Baroque composer, Torelli, who is prominent in the development of the violin concerto. The composer was associated with the Bologna school, however, which had a long tradition of composing solo works for the trumpet, and in fact, the Sinfonia is in reality a concerto for trumpet and strings.

The program will open with a Quintet by Pepusch which is scored for recorders, violin and harpsichord. Combinations of instruments all lying rather high in the pitch-range is quite unusual, and makes possible a fascinating study in sonorities. The recorders will be played by Mrs. Wilfred Norris and Evelyn Guss, violins by Dr. King and Mary King, and the harpsichord by Mary Ruth Linton, all faculty members at Juniata College.

The largest ensemble on the program will perform a rarely-heard Concerto by Haydn, originally written for the lyra, an instrument resembling a hurdy-gurdy. The composer was commissioned to write several works for this instrument by King Ferdinand of Naples, who was an enthusiastic amataur on the instrument. Haydn also wrote alternate versions of these works so that they may be played by more conventional instruments, and this version will be used in the performonce Sunday. Dr. William Russey, in the Chemistry Dept. of the college, will play French horn, and will be joined by Dr. King, and members of the Altoona Symphony who will play the remaining parts for flutes, horns and strings.

The concert in the Ballroom of Ellis will begin at 3:30 and members of the college and community are cordially invited to attend.

Feb. 22 Lecture Series with Miss Doyle, in Shoemaker Galleries is cancelled.

Letters to the Editor

Letters to the editor should be addressed to: Editor, The Juniatian, Box 667, Juniata College, Huntingdon, Pa. 16652. The editors reserve the right to print only non-libelous and responsible content and to edit all letters and commentaries submitted to The Juniatan. The staff also reserves the right to publish all full signatures unless the writer can supply valid reason for omitting his name.

I found it hard to believe that the Juniatian had the audacity to print Rick Boyer's review of Traffic's Shoot Out at the Fantasy Factory. I wonder, is theJuniatian so suffering from a lack of material that it prints anything which is written?

Rick Boyer took the untold trouble of listening to Traffic's Shoot Out at the Fantasy Factory four full times before writing his review. The whole review has the air of one of those last-minute articles, which in many cases shouldn't even be printed. Listening to an album four times before reviewing it can be compared to marrying a girl after four dates; in both cases it is probably a move from desperation.

Rick was "Inclined to say that the numerous personnel changes that have plagued Traffic surely have taken their toll as far as the musicianship on this album is concerned." As far as I am concerned, some of Traffic's finest work has come as the result of personnel changes. Both John Barleycorn Must Die, and The Low Spark of High Heeled Boys, came after the exit of Dave Mason. Both these LP's with the addition of Shoot Out have allowed the creative genius of Steve Winwood and Chris Wood to shine through all the brighter.

The addition of Roger Hawkins and Dave Hood on Shoot Out was a justifiably good move. Let me point out that Hawkins and Hood did not replace Grech and Gordon. In the first place, Jim Gordon was only a studio drummer who played mostly on Low Spark (Capaldi drumed on Barleycorn). And Grech played bass on only a few cuts (Winwood played bass on Barleycorn). David Hood plays a six string bass, and demonstrated in concert that he can more than adaqutely handle the job. Hawkins plays keyboards, and did not replace Gordon as drummer. His addition was to allow Winwood to move over to lead guitar.

After setting the personnel issue straight, I would like to try and make up for Boyer's smear on the music of Shoot Out at the Fantasy Factory. Boyer comments that, "Most of the cuts suffer because of dullness and repetition." He says this is most evident in "Roll Righ Stones." On the contrary, "Roll Right Stones," like Dylan's "Visions of Johanna," grows with each successive listening. Boyer would probably also call "Dear Mr. Fantasy," "Sad Eyed Lady of the Low Lands," and "I'm the Court of the Crimson King" dull because of their length. "Roll Righ Stones" is a very tight, beautifully mixed, and beautifully done song. It is not the quick jolt of rock and roll to which Boyer is probably accustomed to.

Boyer calls "Shoot Out at the Fantasy Factory" the most "Anti-Traffic song they have recorded in years." What he means by this God only knows. "Shoot Out at the Fantasy Factory" is an excellent song, comparable in some ways to "Rock and Roll Stew." Boyer calls it a "Bouncy tune containing sparce instrumentation (just guitars and a barely discernable flute)." Actually it is a very strong song with intense lyrics which are purposely distorted. The song has a faint police siren which is nicely mixed, and a beautiful touch of organ. I would recommend that Boyer pick up a half decent stereo so that he can hear the flute before he listens to the song again. Boyer calls the lyrics repetitive when actually they are not, there isn't even a chorus line which is repeated. The lyrics carry the idea of a "shoot out at a fantasy factory" and this is why the vocals are distorted.

The one song which Boyer seemed to like "Evening Blue" is another well done song as is "Tragic Magic" which Boyer cuts down as a "Highly complex instrumental." After calling Traffic's music boring I don't see how he can object to "Tragic Magic" on these grounds.

Boyer says "It is rather ironic that such fine musicians as Steve Winwood, Jim Capaldi, and Chris Wood could release an album as mediocre as this one." It is not the album, but the review that I find mediocre. With people as unappreciative as Rick Boyer listening to their music, I find no surprise that Traffic chose to end the LP with "Sometimes I Feel So Uninspired."

Lime

by Edward Kinchley Evans

If with the recent snow and icy sleet you happened to slip back into a state of arrested childhood, you had two sweet-meats this week to sugar that memory.

The first was a Totem Theatre presentation under the direction of the Olympian Esther M. Doyle (one of the last of that beautiful race of people God gave to us to interpret the majesty of the spoken word before He discouraged of our ability to even utter intelligible sounds) and was titled "Bed, Barnyard and Bush." I imagine the title was prompted by an innocent's understanding of a relaxation of the moral code. It refered to three of Geoffrey Chaucer's Canterbury Tales and only in the Bed episode did Sex (as we have come to recognize the tousled hair approach to the problem of antiseptic presentation) rise to confront is boldly and with a 'come uppance' moral attached to it. So be it.

The other confection was something called the "Patchwork Girl of Oz", I think, as there was no program. I really didn't mind there not being any program, I guess what gave me my headache was the reason there was no program. Seems as if the gears slipped a few notches and this theatrical adventure was aimed at the three to six year olders. They have a habit, I was enlightened, to 'tear' up programs besides I guess they couldn't have read them anyway. Now, before you put your shoes on backwards and snort, let it be known that I don't dislike 'smallies' . . . in their place I think they're indispensable to the continuance of the race as we now know it. However, my objection comes in when, by all that is held sacred, they have everything now as it is. Why give them theatre? Mothers have whole heartedly turned themselves into their every need or want; half of all movies produced cater to their pleasure; and your life is in peril from them when you go shopping, whether the Mall or the A&P. They have a fantasy world all their own and enough is enough.

The imaginative and courageous Doris Goehring, a girl who gives us all happiness just knowing she is around, directed this funny and slap-stick cartoon of a child's play. Oh! Would that she had given us the same inventiveness in a production of say, Beckett's 'Waiting For Godot'.

Maybe I'm too old for all this tom foolery. Maybe being exposed to twenty-five years of Daumier reality in that Babylon on the Atlantic seaboard has clouded my heart. But some of us are not going back to milking cows and in all good faith could use a little exposure to what the world is all about after we are kicked out of this Eden by whatever Gods of Fate control our destiny.

The child in me was delighted by the magnificence of the strutting rooster, crowing his silly head off in the Barnyard segment of the Tales. Also, in the Bed episode James McDonald was the essence of a Medieval Miller blighted with our continuing sin of selfish enrichment and Charles Knouse looking like a refuge from Grant Wood's "Ride of Paul Revere" was perhaps, or at least for me, the only one who spoke making the words sound as if they were coming from an alive type person. . . . there was a truth behind his speaking tongue.

In "Oz", and again I'm at a loss due to lack of racing sheet, we had the great good fortune to meet a "Yoap". Everyone was charming in

THE BIG HOUSE

AVANT-GARDE ART IS DEAD

by Richard Mettler

Everyone knew that the king was wearing no clothing, that a couple of scoundrels had fooled him into believing that they had sold the most exquisite suit ever made. All the people were afraid to tell the king the truth, expecting to be beheaded if they did and make the king feel foolish. Finally a young boy exclaimed, "the king doesn't have any clothes on." To shorten the adage the two perpetrators were beheaded and the young boy was rewarded for his courage.

A prolonged version of this story has been taking place since the 1960's. A new craze swept the decade of the sixties allowing anyone to do anything in the name of art. Cities like New York, San Francisco, and Munich all became like Paris, a refuge for wayward artists. The people of the adage are the people of today. The two perpetrators are the avant-garde artists and art dealers of today. The king is the mass of sub-intellectuals who defend avant-garde with impressive poly-syllable words like abstract expressionism and conceptualism. They are able to brow beat the average person into appreciating their art or else suffer the consequences of being called unaware or insensitive. Finally the non-existant suit of the king is at least how much of the avant-garde works. It doesn't exist but still everyone raves about it.

Avant-garde art is certainly dead. It went quite beyond the limits of intellectual imagination. Although a lot of good work has come about as a result of the avant-grade craze most of the work is so horrendous that the works, artists, and whole ideology has been cast aside. It's a shame that the few good works had to go along with the rest.

To begin to understand why avant-garde has died it will become necessary to analyze it and compare it to other with-standing art forms. There are basic fallacies about the avant-garde which are intrinsic.

Vincent Van Gogh was supposed to have cut off his ear for a prostitute. Avant-garde however wasn't going to be outdone by Van Gogh. Viennese artist Rudolph Schwarzkogler had someone film him as he amputated his penis inch by inch. Not many people will argue the point that both of these masochistic actions are somewhat shall we say eccentric. The difference however is that Van Gogh's art was apart from his idiosyncracies while Schwarzkogler's irregularity was the result of his "artistic endeavor".

It seems as though an action need only be preserved on film or tape to be considered art. Avant-garde art moved away from the idea of having a final product and stressed more the importance of capturing someone doing something. As long as the action is different and eye catching.

The brief period of glory that avant-garde experienced gave way to the masochistic and sadistic works from the most deviated people which society is capable of producing.

From here, my guess is that art will make an about face and turn again to realism. We've tried it both ways and now we know which one doesn't work.

Avant-garde Art is dead. Requiescat in Pace!

EDITORIAL

by Henry Siedzikowski

There are things going on in Washington now, that should prove to be of more than passing interest to many students at Juniata. In President Nixon's budget request submitted to Congress for next year, 'financial aid to college students is to be greatly reduced. If Congress agrees with the President, a number of Juniata students may stand to lose quite a bit of the financial aid they are now getting.

Everything started with the passage of a new financial aid program, Basic Opportunity Grants. BOG'S are "entitlements of $200 to $1400 per student for each academic year. The program has a total potential of $1 billion dollars per year that could aid up to 2 million students. It was passed with a stipulation, that it can not be funded until all existing financial aid program are funded. This was to insure that BOG's would not be just substituting one program for another.

However, President Nixon has not requested any funds for the Economic Opportunity Grants, but has proposed substituting BOG's for them. This would not only be going against the will of Congress, but also would be hurting a large number of students who depend on EOG's to pay their way through college.

The National Students Lobby is organizing a massive lobbying effort to save EOG's by persuading Congress to appropriate money even if President Nixon will not request it. Anyone can help by writing a letter to a Senator or Congressman. Several from Pennsylvania and neighboring states, which supply Juniata College students, are on their House's Appropriations Committees. In the House they are: Rooney (NY), Flood (Pa), Addabu (NY), Patten (NJ), Long (Md), Robinson (NY), McDade (Pa), and McEwen (NY). In the Senate they are: Mathias (Md) and Schweiker (PA). Think about this carefully. It might affect you, and you may pay for not getting involved.

Letters to Editor—

Once again, the Juniatian has made the mistake of putting an editorial in place of an unbiased feature (I'm refering to last years' article by a mysterious writer who vehemently opposed the freshman class third-place finish during the 1972 "All Class Nite"). Rick Boyer's comments should have been placed in the Editorial section, since his "Record Review" just reflected his opinions, and really was not an honest evaluation of Traffic's latest album, Shoot Out at the Fantasy Factory. An article that supposedly reflects the opinion of a newspaper should be very carefully screened. If an article reflects a staunch bias, then that's why newspapers have Editorial and Letters to the Editor columns.

I first heard Traffic play cuts from their latest album when I attended their concert in Philly, earlier this month. The first time I heard it, I thought it was "decent", but after the second time, I think the album is absolutely tremendous. That's why I feel Rick Boyer's review was written a bit hastily; you have to have a little patience and take your time before formulating an opinion.

Regarding his "anti-Traffic" remark, I guess "Tumbling Dice" was "anti-Rolling Stones" and the Beatles "Sgt. Pepper" album was "anti-Beatles" according to his views. To set matters straight, Traffic's latest album is as great as the previous ones I suggest that all people who are "into Traffic" to pick this album up. If you just like Donny Osmond, Three Dog Nite, or Bobby Vinton, then Traffic's Shoot Out at the Fantasy Factory is not for you.

The MAC publicity bureau tries to be as speedy as possible with the MAC statistics, but we have to settle for the Feb. 1 standings (the latest stats have been released today, too late since we have already gone to press).

As of Feb. 1, Jim Fried of Scranton leads the MAC (North) with a 25.5 ppg. average and Don Johnson of Lebanon Valley leads the MAC (South) with a 29.3 ppg. average. For Juniata, frosh Robbie Carles is 8th (17.0), frosh Donnie Williams 13th (13.5). Remember, these are of February 1st and we'll have the final stats in the first March issue.

The IM office issued a notice last week calling attention to the following points:

1. All IM activities postponed from Feb. 8 will be played Mon., Feb. 26 at the same scheduled times and on the same assigned courts.
2. There will be IM playoffs for leagues A-B-C in men's basketball. The playoffs begin Tues., March 13 and go thru to Thurs., March 15 or Fri., March 16. Note that games may be played Friday. Game times are 7:30 and 8:30 p.m. Team standings will be the deciding factor in which teams make the playoffs, and the IM department decisions will be final in this respect.
3. There will not be IM team volleyball playoffs unless two or more teams are tied for first in the league standings. The championship team will be decided soley by team standings.
4. March Team Handball—a totally new tournament will begin after the break (possibly March 13). Applications are now available in the IM office—Memorial Gym. Properly filled out applications will be accepted until 3:00 p.m. March 2—NO LATE ENTRIES WILL BE ACCEPTED. This March-April tournament will be held in Memorial Gym using the full basketball court plus surrounding areas. The goalie area will be increased and a smaller ball used. All and any suggestions on improving JC's most exciting and fastest growing IM sport will be appreciated.

Women's B-Ball Downed By York

by Tony Martuzas

Guess who got the shaft again? It seems that coaches Joe Lauver and Gil (not B-I-L-L) Landis are having a tough time with women referees. True, games aren't lost just because of a rotten ref, but they can surely rob a team of their momentum.

The girls were battling back and Joe was hit for a technical. A couple seconds later the referee dug up a rule which stated a team will be penalized one technical shot if a replacement does not check in with the official. It just happened that Joe just fielded 5 girls and you can imagine what happened. Joe almost hit the ceiling when he found this out, and the other team was rewarded one more technical free throw.

York was getting away with some things which were called against the Juniata girls during the controversial Penn State-Altoona game.

Anyway, after six games Michelle Campbell is the leading scorer with 31, Sue Shorty) Rosshirt gunned in 29, Vernne Wetzel popped in 26 and Cathy Dicky is fourth with 25. Also in double figures are Kim Norris (19) and Sue Hutt (10). Rounding out the rest of the scoring: Mary Ann Repman (8), Jan Mercincavage (7), Ellie Valentine (6), Elaine Becker (4), and Leslie Whittaker, Petra Theodos, and Cherrie Dettmar each have two points.

THE JUNIATIAN

VOL. XLVIV NO. 15 | Juniata College — Huntingdon, Pa. 16652 | March 21, 1973

Summer Studies In Ecology Open To JC Students

Summer studies in environmental courses at two field stations in upstate New York — at Watkins Glen and in the Catskill foothills — will be open this summer to undergraduates at Juniata College.

Coordinating the summer schedule of undergraduate credit courses will be the College Center of the Finger Lakes consortium, headquartered in Corning, N.Y.

Courses will be scheduled in two summer "tracks" so that an undergraduate may take one or a sequence of courses, in either track.

"You have the option of combining fresh water and terrestrial studies, or concentrating in just one environmental field," an official said.

Inland water studies will be available at the CCFL-operated Finger Lakes Institute on 600-ft. deep Seneca Lake. A field station and 65-ft. research vessel are based at Watkins Glen, home of the U.S. Grand Prix race course.

Courses at Watkins Glen will be Limmology, offered in two sections, July 2-20, and July 30-August 17, each for four credits, and Fresh Water Vertebrates, June 11-29, for four credits.

Terrestrial studies will be held at the 1,100-acre Pine Lake ecological preserve of Hartwick College, a CCFL member. Pine Lake is located near West Davenport in the northern Catskill foothills.

Offerings at Pine Lake will be Bird Study in the Field, June 11-30, for four credits, and Field Biology, scheduled in two sections, July 2-27, and July 30-August 24, each for five credits.

Inquiries about tuition and housing should be addressed to Summer Director, CCFL, Houghton House, Corning, N.Y. 14830.

Student Dorm and Life Style Surveys Prompt Changes In Room Selections

by Pat Minnick

As most of you know by now, the Dean of Students Office has announced the Life Style designations for the dorms and various houses on campus. The lifestyles, A, B, and C, have remained the same as in the past with the exception of "C" which now allows visitation to commence on Noon Friday instead of 6 P.M. This is how the new Life Style alignment stacks up:

Women—A
- Lesher—1st floor
- Tussey—1st floor
- East Houses

Women—B
- South Hall
- Tussey—2nd and 3rd floors

Women—C
- Lesher—2nd and 3rd floors

Men—A
- Cloister Arch
- North-East Wing
- Terrace
- East Houses

Men—B
- Sherwood
- Cloister Wing
- Emmert House
- Moore House
- Oller House

Men—C
- N.J. House
- North-West Wing

How did Dean Robinson and assistants, Associate Dean Gabriel, and Assistant Dean Berrier develop this system? The answer lies almost entirely is the Life Style Preference Survey done earlier this year. The survey, one of the most complete ever, was returned by 83% of the women (342 and 61% of the men (379). The majority of survey returners of both sexes, chose Life Style as more important than dormitory, and therefore dorm designations were based primarily on how many of the projected students for 1973-74 wanted a certain Life Style and also on how many spaces were available in certain dorms. Here are the Life Style preferences of the survey returners along with those of incoming frosh in 72-73 (the basis on which the Dean's Office accounted for next year's Frosh).

Women	Students	Frosh (72)
A	38%	8%
B	46%	64%
C	16%	28%
Men	Students	Frosh (72)
A	57%	30%
B	36%	54%
C	7%	16%

According to Dean Robinson, there has been a "Definite shift to B" and some increase in A as compared with past years The survey in the more complete form of this year will be an annual undertaking to allow change in dorm designations in line with the changes students desire.

Pa. Commissioner Cautions Against Life Insurance Policies

by Tim Reimer

Herbert S. Denenberg, Pennsylvania Insurance Commissioner, is cautioning college students against purchasing a life insurance policy which results in the creation of an immediate debt obligation. In this sales agreement, the first year's premiums are deferred and a legally inforcable promissary note, or loan isued. This can result in an unwanted expense of as much as $100 by immediately eliminating the possibility for reconsideration and cancellation of the policy.

Usually in most insurance agreements the policy may be cancelled without further obligation by the policyholder through non-payment of premiums. An exception to this is the loan agreement. The debt for the first year premiums continues regardless of the payment of premiums or desire to cancel the policy. The loan becomes due immediately when the student does not continue to yap the premiums for five years.

Under this type of sales agreement the first year's premium is paid through a promissary note. This practice serves as an inducement for students to buy a policy still in school. Provided the premiums for the second through fifth years are paid, the note is not due until after five years. The original amount of the promissary note plus the accumulated interest comes due at that time. Students are cautioned against signing more than one promissary note at a time because Insurance Department guidelines require the company to contact each policyholder regarding how he wants to pay his subsequent premiums.

Deneberg is directing the warning to all students 18 and over who may sign valid promissary notes on their own, and primarily to seniors and graduate and professional school students who are the logical purchases.

"Students should discuss their life insurance needs with their parents or other more knowledge persons before they sign any agreements," Denenberg said, "or contact the Insurance Department. A few days of reconsideration may prevent an expensive and painful lesson."

Lecturer Talks On Fallacies Of Education

Our educational system is one of the great controversies today. An extension of this controversy was heard at the eighth will Judy Lecture Series which was presented in Oller Hall on March 15, at 8:15. It was one of the annual featured programs at Juniata. The lecture was entitled "Building Bridges Between Education and Society." One of America's most prominent educators Dr. Allen, the speaker, is presently the Dean of the School of Education at the University of Massachusetts. He has published various articles and five books. A member of various national and professional societies, he has directed several special educational programs and has served as consultant to the White House Conference on Children and to the California State Committee on Public Education.

Dr. Dwight Allen has initiated mini-courses within the public high schools. Also a new curriculum has been outlined by him at the University of Massachusetts. The courses within the program are all pass/fail. The time periods of the courses are unstructed so that when a student feels he has received sufficient benefits from the course he can withdraw from the course.

In accordance to the title of the lecture Dr. Allen advocates that students should take one day a week and devote it to helping social services. "There is more to education than the classroom," he says. With that note Dr. Allen ended.

Saturday Coffeehouse - Art Tedisco Brings Mixed Feelings

by Rick Boyer

On Saturday, March 17, Coffeehouse, presented by Center Board, featured Art Tedisco. Art, a native of Pittsburgh, is currently living somewhere in Western Pennsylvania where "you have to walk two miles to find a paved road". Living in the country, instead of mellowing his voice and guitar playing, seems to have contributed a raw quality to the songs he performs, especially to his singing.

Consequently, Art's Saturday night performance came off as an imitation of the Joe Cocker Ian Anderson type vocal. Whether this was intended or not, the result was a sound that was rather repulsive to the ear. Art used all the vocal touches that Cocker and Anderson use, including grunts, laughing in-between lines, and heavy breathing. This is fine except that Art really overemphasized. For instance, in Jethro Tull's "Wind Up", Art belched out a huge laugh after the first line for seemingly no reason at all. After the line "I didn't mind if they groomed me for success', in the same song, he paused for a moment, looked to his side, and said, "ECCH!" Now, although the latter vocal technique was originally performed by Tull on record, it was spoken subtly, never sounding pretentious or offensive.

As a further emphasis of emotion, Art repeatedly resorted to the use of melodramatic accent and pronunciation that was completely unappealing. For instance, where have you heard "vain" pronounced van, or "ing" suffixes pronounced een. Also, certain words and phrases were, at times, accented to the extent that they become shouts and snarls. To highlight all this, Art subjected himself to strenuous bodily contortions which really didn't add anything to the songs.

The fact that Art applied these techniques to all of his songs is what marred his performance. Fortunately, he chose to do some classic rock and blues material ("Sympathy for the Devil", "Locomative Breath", and "The Letter" being examples.) that fit his style perfectly. However, most of the songs Art played were by Cat Stevens, Jonathan Edwards, CSN&Y and the like. In performing these types of songs, Art usually began with a subdued guitar and vocal (Art sings well in this subdued manner.), but then ruined the rest of the song by lapsing into that melodramatic style midway into the song. That style just doesn't make it when it is applied to quiet folk and love ballads.

A few times though, he refrained from doing this. This was especially noticable when he sang his own compositions, which were surprisingly good. One of these, "Augie's Song", a song about Philadelphia, was a beautiful and moving ballad.

Of course, the presentation was hampered by the fact that Art broke two guitar strings and chipped his pick inumberable times. His guitar was sometimes horribly out of tune, even after several minutes of trying to tune it.

Still, it was an interesting performance. Art certainly had a

Dr. Zimmerer To Serve As Chairman At Meeting About Extremely Holophilic Bacteria

Everything You Want To Know About Holophilic Bacteria—but are afraid to ask—can be found out at the spring meeting of Allegheny Branch of the American Society for Microbiology to be held on the Juniata campus on April 13 and 14. Dr. Robert P. Zimmerer, Associate Professor of Biology at Juniata, will serve as chairman and coordinator of the affair. Microbiologists from Western Pennsylvania and West Virginia will travel to Huntingdon for this educational experience. A featured lecturer will be Dr. Morris Kates, Professor of Biochemistry at the University of Ottawa. He will speak on the topic of Chemistry and Metabolism of Ether Lipids in Membranes of Extremely Halophilic Bacteria. Also, research papers will be presented by area and student microbiologists, during the Saturday morning session.

Another honor acorded Dr. Zimmerer is the opportunity to chair a discussion section, on the "Crown Gall Tumor", at the 24th Annual A.I.B.S. meeting at the University of Massachusetts. Also, he recently had a paper accepted by the "Journal of Experimental Cell Research" on the subject of "A Simple Rapid Method for Filling Micropipets."

Last year, if I remember correctly, Jack Troy wrote a single column for your paper and entitled it "Lemon". Since then I have noticed regularly in your publication a column entitled "Lime." Said feature purports to be written by a "Edward Kinchley Evans." Come off it! There cannot be such a person: no human being writes like that. Since no human being writes like that, "Lime" must be written, here at Nineveh on the Juniata, by Jack Troy. 'Fess up, Jack. Your public awaits a full and open confession, albeit lugubrious.

Life, History and Prognosis Advant Garde Revisited

Ed. Note. Edward Kinchley Evans is a member of the Freshman Writing Program Staff. He alone writes the "Lime" articles. Read on for your favorite Jack Troy.

Richard Mettler's timely obituary of the avant-garde (Juniatian, February 21) prompted me to investigate the history of this movement. I am happy to share my findings with interested readers.

The birth of the avant-garde appears to have taken place in the culinary, rather than the fine arts. Hundreds of thousands of years ago, on the shores of a primordial bay, one of our ancestors ate the first oyster, enjoyed it, and recommended the practice to a friend. "Og, you've gotta be putting us on," was the tribal consensus. Some were openly hostile and began circulating petitions about the socially-disruptive tendencies of mollusk-eaters. A schism developed, then a cult, and eventually a whole movement. The death of the first avant-garde occurred during the Sung Dynasty when the first receips for clam chower appeared on a painted scroll. Somehow, nobody considered the eating of mollusks to be weird any more.

The re-birth of the avant-gards took place in a cave near Niaux, France, around 20,000 B.C. After a successful hunt, one of the Cro-Magnon men was discovered sketching a reindeer on the wall of a cave. "Hey, cut that out," shouted the master of the hunt. "You're supposed to be sharpening spears for tomorrow's hunt, and look at you, dabbling on the walls! Imagine where we'd be if everybody hacked around that way." When word spread that drawing was decadent, everybody wanted a piece of the action. Illicit traffic in charcoal developed, and the death of the re-birth of avant-garde art occurred in 1897, with the founding of the Grumbacher Art Supply Company, in Skokie, Illinois.

The delivery of the avant-garde by Caesarian section came during the 1550's, when Michaelangelo was at work on the Sistine chapel's dome. The artist was accosted by the shrill voice of an indignant lady, shouting up at him from the ground floor. "I like the theme of "The Creation of Adam," she called, "but why isn't Adam wearing his pants? You're a sick, revolting, decadent, artist." This avant-garde died a hard death in Macy's department store at Christmas in 1968, when an anatomically-precise baby boy doll went on sale. Children didn't bat an eye: several adults asked if the doll came with a fig leaf.

The rennaissance of the avant-garde was first noticed around 1880, when an anonymous man appeared at the door of his dark room and muttered, "Hot dam!" "Just a minute there," came the cautioning voice of the status quo. "Before you go disrupting things, remember that art is what you do with a brush and pen. Photography is what you do with a camera. You might not like it, but that's the way things are set up. Toe the line, Bub." In the 1930's the published photographs of Edward Steichen, Dorthea Lang, and Walker Evans, had the effect of laying the renaissance of avant-garde in its grave.

The Reconstruction of the avant-garde crept in around 1933, when E. E. Cummings tried to find a publisher for his latest poems. "Oh, oh. E.E." said the publishers. "You've gone too far this time. The words in your poems are coming Upon arriving on campus after the recent vacation, I was immediately met with two choatic situations, registration and my mailbox. With my mind seriously blurred from the registration process, I made what may have been a big mistake. I went through my mail.

Anyway, the gems I found were a paper marked "Greetings". After reading it, I checked to see if maybe Uncle Sam had something to tell me, but it turned out to be from the food service.

This, for lack of a better term, commando paper listed all the atrocities that a student was not supposed to commit on the food service. After reading it, I was notably shaken.

This feeling was, fortunately or unfortunately, interupted by dinner time. Being a law-abiding citizen, I dutifully got my meal ticket and handed over to eat. It didn't really add to the day.

After dinner, we had a quick game of cards and then met our lawyers to find out our rights when the FBI came searching for any stolen spoons.

By this time I was exhausted, so I decided to turn in. It was a mistake. With dinner still solidly in my stomach and thoughs of my "greetings" sheet still dancing in my head, the nightmares started right away.

It was terrible. I saw myself being stopped by metal detectors while in the process of leaving the cafeteria. It turned out to be only my belt buckle, but in the process I was discovered to be holding a half eaten cookie in my hand. Two Gestopo agents immediately appeared and took me away.

Now, you wonder what this whimsical story has to do with anything. Well, it is my opinion that with this new "get tough" stand by the food service, it is time we, the students, got a little tougher ourselves.

For quite a while, there has been talk amoung students over the possibility of reimbursement for uneaten meals. I think now is the time for our big push.

We have been presented with generally poor food, and now we stand accused of stealing it. Well, I propose that if I am stealing when walking out of the cafeteria with food, then they are stealing by making me pay for all the breakfasts I don't eat.

Resident students don't have any choice but to use the food service, but I think they should have some say. My proposal is simple. Instead of these insane meal tickets, give each student a book of tickets for meals. It would be a foolproof way of checking people going in, and it would allow students to be reimbursed for meals not eaten.

And maybe, just maybe, the food would improve because people just wouldn't eat some of the things that are served.

For sometime the J. Geils Band has reigned as king of the tight, three minute rock number. "The Morning After", their last studio LP, left a gritty but very pleasant after taste in our mouths. We found ourselves wearing out the grooves on such songs as, "The Usual Place", "Cry One More Time", and "Looking For a Love", but something was wrong. Somehow we could sympathize, but not feel, that gutter rough, street corner boogie woogie the Geils Band was putting to us. Like it or not, most of us have grown up in an affluent, strictly middle class society. The closest any one of us has come to "Floyds Hotel" was at the local Jerry Lewis Cinema. But the music was good, and the energy high, so we kept right on dancing. Those of us with rock and roll pulsing in our veins grew to be quite fond of J. Geils despite ourselves.

After Christmas we decided to replenish our supply of rock roll, so we found ourselves leafing through the bins at the discount center record sale. Suddenly there was Edgar Winter complete with makeup, diamond necklace, and an absurd beauty mark pasted to his cheek. Hell, it was on sale, and with a kinky title like "They Only Come Out At Night", how could we pass it by? Half an hour later we were damn glad we plunked down the four greens. Not only was it what we wanted, rock and roll, but it also did a number on the J. Geils Band. Our ass ends moved for nearly forty straight minutes, except this time we knew what the hell he was talking about! We identified! There wasn't one among us that didn't know the feeling spelled out in "Hanging Around": "Driving along with my radio on feeling good/Ain't got no lady but maybe I'm thinking I could/. . .No I don't see the world going by/I'm just hanging around." This was music only we could understand, it was our blues. Edgar Winter and his composing partner, Dan Hartman, had written the record of the year.

Unlike most rock LPs, The Edgar Winter Groups' "They Only Come Out At Night" functions as an album, not just a collection of ten songs. The only weak points, "Alta Mira" and "Autumn" (Both of which are good enough to make Three Dog Night's mouth water) are juxtapositioned perfectly. Both are placed in the third slot as a kind of respite. In fact, the group had the insight to sandwich the tender sweet "Autumn" directly between their roughest two numbers "Rock And Roll Boogie Woogie Blues" and "We All Had A Real Good Time." "Undercover Man", the records show of muscle, makes the perfect ending tune for side one. After smoking on the pad for four rockers, Winter launches his rocket to energy heights unknown with his gravel throated scream, "I'm the undercover man." Understandably, closing a work like this without leaving the listener stranded somewhere in space could become quite a problem, but "Frankenstein" brings us down as easy as "Hanging Around" took us up. We had found the ultimate record, our culture neatly packaged in one record jacket. Put away the rest of your discs and pick up "They Only Come Out At Night", it may be a long while until another record is produced exclusively for us.

This is a weekly column that will inform the reader of some historical facts of Juniata College as well as information on the professors. I hope to point out as many facts of interest that I can discover in my research. The other part of the column will deal with brief biographies on different professors.

If anyone wishes to know more about a certain professor, please contact me through Box 71.

HOW THE COLLEGE GOT A BAD NAME

In order to start this series on the right foot, I found it interesting how the name of the College had changed. Back in 1876 when this college was founded it was called Huntingdon Normal School. The following year, the name was changed to the Brethren's Normal School and Collegiate Institute, other wise known I suppose as B.N. S.C.I. Well, at least no one would call it Juniata. B.N.S.C.I. must have seemed too long to them so they changed it to the Brethren's Normal College in 1878. At this time, Founder's Hall was constructed and a white stone with the letters B.N.C. was placed above the front entrance. They are still there today. To keep up with the changing times, again the name was changed and shortened to the Normal College in 1881. After twelve years with this name, the college of the Juniata Valley became J.C.

Lime

by Edward Kinchley Evans

One of the more aggravating enigmas of the human heart is the aberration we clinically label "romantic love" and justly think we have safely isolated it from the rest of our experiences. We read about it in Gothic Novels and in cheap magazines. We sometimes witness it's effects on the behaviour of a friend, a relative, or celebrity and quickly cross ourselves as protection against contagion. It is the 'bete noire' of Marriage yet we mistakenly pursue the belief it should be the foundation stone that institution is built upon. It's what popular music is all about.

Occasionally, we ourselves are caught in the nightmarish whirlpool of one of It's outer circles and though we never survive, the person who claims salvage rights on the surfacing wreck tries to send out distress signals of the ordeal.

Such a person is Bo Widerberg, the Swedish director who made the film "Elvira Madigan" recently screened in Oller Hall. It is an impatient film. It is flawed with terrible and naive symbols. It has pieces of business grave robbed from others. It is achingly slow in it's dissection of two humans who abandon sanity and the conventional world for a Oneness which devours them in the pain of it's birth. It is an exquisite study of our subject at hand "romantic love". Set in the century of fractured sunlight, the film starts with two figures in a landscape chasing butterflies. The butterfly is an age old symbol representing immortality. The movie ends in death with one of the lovers still engaged in this fragile pursuit.

At some point in your life you are going to have to cope with this derangement of the senses. If it does not cross your own door with a red mark, then it will light madness in the eyes of one whom you love, a child, a parent, or a friend. Part of every day's happiness depends on understanding others. Contrary to the scientific approach, the human condition is more often ruled by emotional moods than intellectual theories.

The sad thing is that we are such greedy little beasts in our pampered Play Crib of a world, that if we can't stuff our mouths without pause with immediate goodies, we get up and leave the table to go elsewhere in our search for pleasure. In our impatience for Instant Everything and bloated with the Divine knowledge that the World owes us a living (or why are we here?), we hasten away from lessons Life offers us in an attempt to teach us survival. If you walked out on "Elvira Madigan", it was your loss.

The films which have been chosen for you for the coming period of time are well worth your consideration. Showing them in Oller is an extra bonus. Some will take patience on your part but will reward you in better understanding yourself and what is happening to you to change you into someone who contributes to Life rather than leeching.

The choice, fortunately, is yours.

apart all over the page. Our typographers and readers will go into tizzies. See you around." Two years later, Harcourt, Brace, and Company published No Thanks, and Mr. Cummings dedicated it to the dozen or so publishers who had refused it, and another a. g. bit the dust.

The emergence of the avant-garde in three-dimensional art took place about mid-way through the 20th century, when David Smith introduced the method of direct metal welding into the suave, complacent world of marble, wood, and cast bronze sculpture. A gallery owner spoke the majority opinion when he suggested that Mr. Smith go to work in an auto-body shop. The death of the emergence occurred at Bucknell University, the nation's last refuge of the attitude which distinguishes the "fine," and the "applied" arts, when the lawn in front of the student center became a resting place for a stainless steel cube, conceived to imply direction. The year was 1970.

The Golden Age of avant-garde is going on all around us. A man in Australia wrapped up an entire cliff with cellophane, partly to protest the notion that art must at least fit into an art gallery. Somebody else out there on the fringe has teams of farmers working for him, plowing gigantic patterns in fields across the American mid-West. Aerial photography records the results, which are then submitted as "evidence" in an exhibition held in cities remote from the actual locations involved. Class Oldenburg has proposed a huge sculpture to be fitted over a bridge crossing the river thames. A float, resting on the river, would respond to the ebb and flow of the tides, raising and lowering the sculpture twenty-four hours a day. Meanwhile, a forlorn Rudolph Schwarzkogler sits in his room in Venice, wistfully playing his movie backwards, wishing it had all been a dream, and pondering whether he should accept a lucrative offer to pose nude on a women's lib poster over the words, "You can trust this man!"

The avant-garde has at least nine lives. Like a starfish, it enjoys nothing better than to be dismantled and tossed overboard — given up for dead.

Excelsior!

"How it is . . . a negative educational experience at Juniata"

Dear Editor:

I am a student, a senior, taking my last 4 courses to complete my senior year. Recently, I was surprised to receive a note in my mailbox from an instructor, who I have for a course which I am taking credit by exam, informing me that I had failed the course.

The course requirements are a comprehensive paper and to critically discuss the 4 other students' papers and defend my own in 5 separate hour long discussion sessions. The reason given by the instructor for "point blank" failing me was that I missed attending the first session and half the second. It seemed to her not a matter for lowering my grade to anywhere through the continuum from A to D, or administering an incomplete (I did write my paper and 3 full discussion s ons are left in the term). She interpreted my not having attended as lack of interest (although it was definitely not!), and refused to hear any viable alternatives such as my taking time outside of class to do exactly the same thing I could have done in class; which was to critically discuss the 2 individuals' papers with them (they agreed to take the time outside of class to do just that with me because I missed their presentations). So, essentially I fail because of attendance reasons. Strangely enough, in the 1972-73 Juniata College Catalogue it states that for credit by exam "students may be given credit for regularly offered courses if they pass the exams and meet other requirements of the courses as stipulated by the instructor, other than class attendance." What this means personally for me is: that for missing 1½ hours of class I will 1. not graduate at the end of this month 2. have to pay for and take a single course over which will cover the span of 3 months (next terms' students must do the antecedent reading material before doing their paper) in order to attend those few hours which I feel I could make up in the next 2 weeks (by the suggested alternative above) and take a cut in the grade or incomplete for not proceeding in the "right way" and 3. change my plans concerning where I'll be living and when I'll be starting graduate school, etc.

With frustration, I went to the Provost, who stated, surely these people (the professors) were rational people and if they (she) accepted an alternative viable course of action it was fine with him! But that the requirements for the course (although credit by exam form of independent study) included attendance and that was how it was . . . ! Apparently, he also felt that an F opposed to a concerned effort to make up the missed discussion or any other grade, or incomplete was how it should be if "his" professors felt that way.

P. S. Since writing this letter I was going to the next discussion meeting and upon seeing me the instructor displayed utter amazement by saying "What are you doing here?" I informed her that after all I was taking the course, had previously enrolled and paid for it. She seemed at a loss to understand that aversive manipulation of grades could fail to bring about disinterest in education for a student!

I ask you, is this what education and independent study is all about?

Requistration Story

Yes, students, readers, boys and girls, it's shaft-time at good old J.C. It's the time of year when teachers get out their attendance books, students get out the notebooks, and parents get out the checkbooks.

Students, herded like lemmings to the sea, prospective registrars sit with eyes agleam, waiting for the innocent young thing to approach his lair. When one does, (When a person enters the room, he loses all civil rights. He is then called "Peon") out come the pencils, forms, schedules and menos beyond all number and score.

So, the now discomfited student is confronted with a kindly group (Don't let their looks fool you. Each of these persons are highly trained, they could easily take over the job of the most hated person in your old high school). whom take their papers, their cards, and their souls, and put them in a box, to be sent over to "The Computer" for processing. If they put them in the box as they were taught, then you will never get any course you registered for. If, by some oft chance they make an error, then, Lucky day, you just might get a course you want (But don't bet on it).

Some dear person is then entrusted to carry to the Computer, the box. It is his job, since he earned enough brownie points to buy it (Just like trading stamps) to see to it that the contents of he box never reach the computer. Along the way, he will be accosted by three large dogs, a computer card robber, and a sanitation man. Each of these accostees have been briefed and instructed in the fine art of criminal harassment. It is their job to see to it that the cards do not get to the computer. (That's one more safeguard to insure that the class you pick won't be the class you get). When, and if, the cards get to the computer, they are handed to a demented little man (all computer operators are demented) who was probably a drop-out of a veterans' approved computer course. The computer operator then starts to work. He turns on the machine (a false front applied to a packing crate) which commences to make computer sounds (Not unlike the noises a 65 falcon makes). He feeds the cards into the gaping maw of the computer, where they are electronically sorted, through the use of a giant fan. This fan blows the cards about until they fly out one of the many holes in the box. The operator, seeing that the machine is done, picks up the cards in series of three, and puts them in piles about the room. He then looks down the roster and puts three (or sometimes four, if he's had a bad night) by each name. From that, he makes up the class roster and your schedule.

I hope I have cleared up the registration mystery.

Traffic Shoot Out At The Fantasy Factory

I'm writing about a letter from Tony Martuzas which appeared in the February 21st issue of the Juniatian.

In it he disagrees with Rick Boyer's review of the new Traffic album. I won't fight him there — he's entitled to his own opinion.

But I don't feel he's entitled to turn a quarrel with Boyer into a criticism of the newspaper's layout. He starts by saying the review should have been marked as an editorial because it "just reflected his opinions, and was not an honest evaluation of Traffic's latest album".

He seems to be saying that record reviews should not contain the author's opinions. Then what would they consist of? The names of the songs? A review is a writer's judgements on something.

I think Martuzas really meant Boyer's column disagreed with him, he goes on to say so in fact.

On the last page of the same issue Martuzas begins a description of a women's basketball game with "Guess who got the shaft again?" Is that unbiased reporting? No. Is he quoting a source? No. Then it's the reporter's opinion.

Why does he put it in a sports article after saying opinion only belongs in editorials? Because he knows a review of a game, or a record, would be meaningless, without it.

Then why is he mad at Boyer's article? It put down an album he likes. When an editor, which Tony Martuzas is, seems to say an opinion he disagrees with shouldn't be printed, I wonder about where the paper is headed. Martuzas has a right to disagree with Boyer, but both should be able to print their feelings, as long as they say that's all they are, which Boyer did, which Martuzas didn't.

Rob Lopresti

Tony

Okay, Okay! I get the message and I'll admit that I was wrong for putting Rick down. But "Shootout at the Fantasy Factory" is still a great album, despite the unfavorable review the "Rolling Stone" even gave.

Concert Choir Performs Outstanding Home Concert

by Tim Reimer

The Juniata College Concert Choir presented an overwhelming Homecoming concert, Monday night in Oller Hall. The Choir, under the direction of Bruce A. Hirsch, performed the program of music they presented on their recent road tour of the Mid-Atlantic and New England States. The performance was given in three sets along with a special presentation of selections from the musical "You're a Good Man Charlie Brown."

The first set was sacred, traditional songs, many in Latin, with the highlights being "Transmuted," the contemporary work of Butler/Untermeyer and Sharagorn and Fuguo, a Hovhaness piece performed by the Juniata Brass Ensemble. The last song before intermission was a resounding Nun Danket Alle Gott (Now Thank We All Our God) composed by J. Pachelbel.

After the intermission the choir enchanted the audience with three bright, fast-moving, contemporary madrigals of Butler; Ladies and Ye Youthful Lovers, O Lovely Bud, and Welcome to May. The next piece was selections from Johann Strauss's Die Fleudemus (The Bat). Strauss, The "Waltz King" wrote this operatta during the last half of the 19th century when he was master over the outstanding talents of Brahms and Wagner. Three soloists performed, Margaret Loving and Linda Fidler, sopranos and Terry Tomassetti, tenor.

In place of the break between the second and third sets, highlights from the choir's fall musical "You're A Good Man Charlie Brown" were presented as a happy, light interlude. Parts were portrayed by: Judy Rosen, Lucy; Frank Pote, Snoopy; John Summerwille, Charlie Brown; Phil Woodworth, Linus; Debbie Holsinger, Peppermint Pattie; and Dave Bombaugh, Schroeder.

The third set, or encore set, was short, containing only three numbers. The three: DeCormier's Tum-

Robust Vocals Of Bert Mayne Enjoyed by All

by Dave Kraft

Although I never wrote a newspaper article in my life, Jim Hunter cornered me and begged me to cover the Bert Mayne concert. I figured he must have been really desperate to ask me, so I gave in to his plea. On Sunday night I strolled up to 'Tote', but no singer. I was told to try downstairs and found him in what loked to be a half-completed boiler room, cutely known as the 'mini-stage'. There sat a man who looked an equal to any average bear, and who possesed a growl that would make said bruin turn-tail. I had attended several coffeehouses before Sunday night's, but never had I seen a flawless and entertaining performance. He was very honest and humble about his guitar ability, admitting, "Listen, I can't play worth a damn, I just fake admirably." I would say that he played damn well, the audience wasn't there for guitar theatrics.

His songs were mainly written by himself, a few others were rather unknown ones by Don McClean, John Denver, and Dwight Axton, to mention a few. His act was not limited to just 'strummin' and 'hummin' however. He would give long introductions about his songs gradually meandering into stories about the Huntingdon police, a Canadian border adventure, and several hard-hitting jokes and puns. His wide traveling and touring life became enlivened as he told his stories and sang songs about his life experiences. In several tunes he pulled out a kazoo and accompanied himself in a jaunty ragtime style. His growly voice added a lot to the kazoo, making the audience crack up when he combined the playing with some head gyrations. Proof of his abilities to captivate an audience was demonstrated at the end of his show, when he asked the audience to sing along on the chorus. Very few didn't sing, in fact many were singing as loud as Bert. I was really quite impressed by the whole concert and would enjoy another Bert Mayne concert here at 'Juniata' in the future.

Chris Peterson To Attend Political Symposium

by Tim Reimer

When H. Christopher Peterson pulls into the streets of French Lick, Indiana, he will witness an unusual sight for French Licks, namely students from all over the country. French Lick, a community of less than 2,500, will overflow with people attending the Third Annual National Student Symposiun on the Presidency, from March 30 - April 1. Chris Peterson, a junior political science major here at Juniata, will participate with 174 other students all from different colleges and universities across the United States.

In making the nomination, Dr. Stauffer said, "It is a great pleasure to nominate for participation H. Christopher Peterson, — Chris has some very specific political aspirations for himself and is presently serving in his home township as a Republican Committeeman. I am confident that at French Lick, he will emerge as a leader among the student participants in the symposium."

Present and former leaders of both the Executive and Legislative branches of the Federal government will be discussing major foreign and domestic policy at the symposium. Among those present will be Elliot Richardson, Secretary of Health Education and Welfare, and Kenneth Rush, Deputy Secretary of Defense.

Two JC Girls Read At IUP

by Robert Lopresti

Vicki Harris and Jane Lee Kuykendall, both students at Juniata College, attended an oral interpretation festival in late February. It was held at the Indiana State University in Tere Haute, Indiana.

There were more than two hundred people at the festival, with participants from forty schools. They broke into groups of around five, which discussed the performances the members did in each of three categories: poetry, prose, and free choice.

Vicki Harris is a senior, majoring in English. She has been involved in various kinds of oral interpretation activities here at Juniata, including the Reader's Theatre.

At the festival she presented an adaptation of "The Reeve's Tale" from Chaucer's Canterbury Tales, a reading from the Book of Daniel in the Old Testament, and a Theodore Roethke poem which Vicki called "Her Becoming".

Jane Lee Kuykendall is a junior at Juniata. Her selections at the festival were three Sylvia Plath poems, a three Character reading from The Crucible by Arthur Miller, and a selection from Sarah Kemble Knight's "A Diary of an Early American School Teacher".

They both felt the festival was both enjoyable and "a learning experience to have two hundred people gathered together with one interest. They both pointed out the chance to meet people with different ideas on oral interpretation.

Vicki and Jane Lee were aided in preparing their performances by Dr. Ester Doyle, an English professor at JC.

Student Handbook Being Organized For 73-74 School Year

by Alice Boomhower

A student handbook for next year is being gathered by various committees under the direction of Don Stone. This handbook will include lists of entertainment on and off campus, explanations of activities and interests during the year, the legal status of students, and where to go and who to see for certain problems.

It is hoped that this handbook can be circulated at the beginning of the next school year to incoming Frosh as well as to upperclassmen. This book will help sudents find their way and know where to find things they are looking for. Anyone interested in helping is encouraged to contact Don Stone.

Philosophy Symposium To Be Held On Juniata's Campus April 4-6

by Cindy Szczerba

Is a citizen ever justified in acting illegally? That's the topic for discussion during a political symposium on the Juniata college campus April 4-6.

The symposium will include three prominent Eastern educators, Dr. Eugene Rostow of the Yale Law School, Dr. Richard Taylor, professor of philosophy at the University of Rochester and Dr. Ralph Potter, professor of Social Ethics at Harvard Divinity School.

The three speakers will give brief presentations on the major subject of the symposium, "The State and the Limits of Civil Obedience," in the main event April 5, at 8:15 p.m. in Oller Hall.

Following the presentations will be a period of response for the speakers alone and then a general question and answer session in which the audience is invited to participate.

Included in the symposium schedule are luncheons on both April 5 and 6 at 12 noon which will give all persons a chance to direct questions to the guests. Those interested are asked to request luncheon reservations for either day, from Dr. Hartman. There will also be a dinner at 6 p.m. on April 5.

All three of the visiting speakers are well-qualified to discuss the limits of civil obedience. Dr. Rostow is an expert in political decision making, Dr. Taylor is a philosopher and Dr. Potter an expert in social ethics.

Dr. Rostow's publication include Planning for Freedom, The Sovereign Prerogative, Law, Power and the Pursuit of Peace, Nemesis and Is Law Dead?

Dr. Taylor has written Metaphysical, Action and Purpose, and Good and Evil. His new book, Freedom, Anarchy, and the Law will appear this spring.

Among many of Dr. Potter's publications is a book War and Moral Discourse and an article entitled "The Moral Logic of War." Various books by these men will be made available in the book store or in the library on reserve.

The symposium, made possible by a grant from the S&H Foundation and a contribution from the Council for Philosophical Studies, is the first of its kind to be held on the Juniata campus. The purpose of the program is to enable individuals to discuss with major thinkers a fundamental issue in political philosophy—Is a citizen ever justified in acting illegally?

Interested faculty members who wish the speakers to appear in their classes are asked to get in touch with Dr. Hartman. A study group will meet next Tuesday evening at 6 p.m. in the Gold Room to discuss the topic of the symposium. Those who would like to get envolved should also contact Dr. Hartman. All students, faculty administrators and the public are invited to attend.

Dr. Anna Benjamin Presented "Athens As A University Town"

by Patrick E. Fleagle

Dr. Anna Benjamin, chairman, of the Department of Classics at Rutgers University, recently spoke and showed slides on the subject of "Athens as a University Town." Dr. Benjamin formerly taught at Juniata College and the University of Missouri. She is also the former editor of Archaeology Magazine and a Fellow of the American Excavations in Athens.

The University was born in Athens and, according to Dr. Benjamin, within its walls "started the man who dominated Western thought." While there was both public and private education in Athens, Dr. Benjamin spoke mainly on the aspects of the public domain.

Citing the bustle of modern Athens as indicative of its ancient counterpart, Dr. Benjamin explained that the people of Athens were the first patron of the University, an institution where free speech and teaching were allowed. Showing several slides of the excavated "tortuous ruins", Dr. Benjamin detailed the elaborate buildings which housed the open classrooms of Athens' great university teachers. The slides revealed excavations of dilapidated student housing facilities where complicated and often harsh hazing rituals for new students took place.

Noting that "universities thrive in dying cities," Dr. Benjamin spoke of Athens' public forum, the Agora. Located in this forum is the recently excavated Royal Stoa, the building which housed the stone where the state brought charges against Socrates. This stone was also the location where oaths of office were taken by public officials.

Lamenting that the famous Painted Stoa was evidently under an unexcavable church, Dr. Benjamin spoke of the famous structure

EASTER SEAL MARATHON COMMENCES FRIDAY APRIL 7 AT NOON

Letters to the Editor

Letters to the editor should be addressed to: Editor, The Juniatian, Box 667. Juniata College, Huntingdon. Pa. 16652. The editors reserve the right to print only non-libelous and responsible conters and to edit all letters and commentaries submitted to The Juniatan. The staff also reserves the right to publish all full signatures unless the writer can supply valid reason for omitting his name.

Save the UPI

First of all, in order to become professional in our approach to this campus media, the radio, we must attempt to consider WJC as a business rather than just a fun-filled extracuricular activity. This means that we must think, plan, and act like a business.

So we have to form ideas that are business-like in order to produce favorable results for WJC's new image, plan definite directions in which to exert our efforts, and have an organized definition of our goals.

As is the case in any business, we must strive to gain the support of our customers, in this case, the students of Juniata. Here is where we must first build: taking the students on campus and attracting their genuine interest in WJC.

Operating on a very limited fund, (and for this operation, no fund) it will be quite difficult to work towards any goal. But with the use of the resources available in the way of time, energy, imagination, and interest, we have alot in our favor already.

We can't of course just jump in and cry for money from the student body. There is too much apathy at the moment to expect much more than a few quarters from a good samaritan here and there. So the plan I have devised is divided into three parts: ATTRACT, PUBLICIZE, and LAUNCH!

ATTRACT: Attract and create interest in the student body. Run radio contests and offer prizes. If necessary, ask for donations of any amount from everybody associated with WJC. With this money, buy prizes: 45's, food, certificates at Tote, anything at all at the cheapest price. Let people donate things: records, magazines, any thing!

PUBLICIZE: Publicize a fund-raising project. "SAVE THE P.P.I." Ask for donations from the students. Then sponsor a series of record hops (as many as possible), making it known that all profits are for the teletype.

LAUNCH: Launch the project in full force. Do as many things as possible to get money. Sell food in the dorms on weekends to satisfy the munchies (donuts, pretzels, anything!).

MAKE IT KNOWN THAT WE NEED MONEY IN ORDER TO KEEP THE TELETYPE. IF A GOAL IS KNOWN BY THE STUDENTS, WE CAN EXPECT THAT RESULTS WILL BE GREATER.

Dear Mr. Stauffer:

The reason I am writing this to you is because of the kindness and thoughtfulness of one of your students. I am sorry to say I do not know her name, but she is a Sophomore at Juniata.

On February 16th, I left the train, trying to be careful walking, and immediately fell on a sheet of ice — suitcase and all. This young lady came to my assistance, took my bag, insisted I get in her car and drove me to where my mother lives. I was simply delighted with her.

On my return trip to Lansdowne, I spoke with Dr. Foster Ulrich, on the train, told him the above story and he suggested that I write you — which I am very happy to do.

I don't know many college students or younger people, and as you know, lots of not too nice things have been said. But I want to say that after this little incident, my faith in the youth has been greatly restored. I think I must have believed most of them are all right, anyhow!

I certainly wish this young lady all the luck and success she can muster. I feel she will turn out just fine.

Sincerely,
Gladys Ritter Berman

On Saturday night, Juniata College celebrated its traditional All Class Night. In a change from the past, there were no alumni on the judges panel, only faculty. There is a question to be raised as to whether faculty can judge the plays according to the spirit of the night. While one of the judges called it, "one of the worst I've seen," I wonder if the students would agree.

And speaking of Juniata traditions, next Tuesday, April 3, are the elections for President and Vice-President of Student Government. Also to be elected are President and Vice-President of Dormitory Government. There is a new concept in elections now at Juniata: the ticket. It was started last year by the infamous "ticket." This year, any ticket will be so designated on the ballot, but you are not required to vote strictly by the tickets. It's permissible to split your vote.

This year, there are two condidates for each of the offices of President and Vice-President. One ticket is Dave Baer for President, and Jim Gerek for Vice-President. The other ticket is Eric Kiershawer for President and Gary Gillen, better known as Stumpy, for Vice-President. The candidates should be around to all the dorms in the week prior to elections, so take time to meet them and vote.

DISCussion

by Rick Boyer

The Byrds are responsible for a lot of things in the American music scene. With the possible exception of Bob Dylan, the Byrds have been America's most pioneering band. In 1965, with the advent of "Mr. Tambourine Man" the Byrds combined folk lyrics and rock music and coined the phrase folk-rock. In 1968, the Byrds were credited with making country-rock popular (even before Dylan. Despite numerous personnel changes, the Byrds have managed to stay in existence for over eight years, even though Roger (formerly Jim) McGuinn is the only member remaining who was part of the original group that was formed in Los Angeles in late 1964.

Well, for all you Byrds freaks out there, that original group, consisting of Roger McGuinn, David Crosby, Chris Hillman, Gene Clark, and Michael Clarke, recently got together and recorded an album. This reunion is probably not permanent or official The "other" Byrds, headed by McGuinn and including Clarence White, Gene Parsons, and Skip Battin, still perform and records. David Crosby, Chris Hillman, and Gene Clark are also musically active with other people.

At any rate, this new album, called simply "Byrds", represents the first time the original band has played together since the recording of "Turn, Turn, Turn!", some seven years ago. That old, unmistakable Byrds sound, with the rich and full 12-string guitar effect, seems to have been largely replaced by a soft country flavor. This comes as no surprise. Most of the original members have been associated with country or related styles of music lately: Chris Hillman with the Flying Burrito Brothers and Manassos, Mike Clarke also with the Burrito Brothers, and McGuinn and the Byrds' (other) recent country-rock style.

Gene Clarke, Hillman, Crosby, and McGuinn each wrote two songs for the album. In addition, "Cowgirl in the Sand", "(See the Sky) About to Rain", both by Neil Young, and Joni Mitchell's "For Free!" are included. Clark's "Full Circle", which opens the album, starts out sounding like the old Byrds, but Gene's vocal quickly changes the song into a country-ish tune. This cut features some pretty mandolin work by Chris Hillman. Clark's other song, "Changing Heart", is done in the same fashion, this time with a harmonica and some haunting vocal harmony. "Things Will Be Better", by Chris Hillman, is a nice little rocker whose guitar line is reminiscent of that crisp, clean 12-string sound of old. Chris's "Borrowing Time" is a short catchy tune with an undeniably Mexican flavor to it.

This brings us to David Crosby and Roger McGuinn. In many ways, these two musicians were (are) the catalyst of the group. They provided most of the original material and are the only members of the original Byrds that have remained artistically important after the group's demise. I like McGuinn's two compositions, "Sweet Mary" and "Born to Rock and Roll". The former song is straight country-blues with Hillman's mandolin again featured as the lead instrument. The latter song sounds very much like something the "other" Byrds would do. For some strange reason, its done acoustically with just the slightest mixing of electric guitar. I get the feeling it somehow would have sounded better if done electrically.

David Crosby's two songs are surprisingly weak. You've heard "Laughing". It was on Crosby's solo album which was released two year sago. Although it is a fine song, this latest version falls short of the other. It lacks the beautiful steel and electric guitar of the former version. Consequently, the new version fails to capture the haunting mood of the other. "Long Live the King", the other Crosby composition on the album, continues in the style of his social-political coment songs (eg "Almost Cut My Hair"). "...King" lacks structure and is just plain dull. It is the weakest song on the album.

The other three songs by Neil Young and Joni Mitchell are nice but offer little or no improvement over their original recordings.

So there you have it. Generally, "Byrds" is a fine record. Still, it's not the masterpriece or "pioneer album" that a Byrds fan might ex-

THE BIG HOUSE

One of the greatest features of some Broadway productions is the way they preserve a period of history. No, No, Nanette is much a production. I saw No, No. Nanette in New York at the Forty-third Street Theatre. It presently is playing in Philadelphia.

No, No, Nanette is purely for enjoyment. No thinking is required to discern some hidden lesson and any low moron could keep up with the plot. In 1925 No, No, Nanette enjoyed considerable success as a mirror of the times. In its revival it has also received much acclaim but its perspective has remained the same in that it now is a depiction of those times.

I would be so bold as to assert that very few people would leave the theatre with a mediocre reaction; you either love it or you hate it, you either walk out after the first act or you want o see it again and again. These assertions, however, are strictly out of my experience and I'm sure that if you wanted to take the trouble you could find a number of instances that prove me wrong.

Throughout the year since I've experienced No. No. Nanette I've been finding myself defending the production against people who in my opinion should be the last to declaim it. I've debated with amateur actors from various acting workshops in New York and with some students at the Annenburg Theatre from The University of Pennsylvania. Many people from these organizations refer to No. No. Nanette as junk, corny, frivolous, the list could go on infinitely. The production may very well be junk to them but by the fact that they used a value judgement as a criticism shows just how amateur they are. The production isn't corny because it's just a depiction of higher echelon life in New York during the twenties. The music, dances, and attire weren't considered corny in 1925 so we have no right to consider it so today when we see it as a depiction. It is frivolous but frivolity was the whole mood about which the play revolves. Before you bitch about what went into such a production you first should give some thought about what you would do differently and the possible results. You must place yourself into the times to enjoy something like No. No. Nanette. In fact you must assume certain frames of mind to appreciate any art form. You can't just sit back and let it all come to you. A certain amount of exertion on the part of the patron is always nice.

If after you've given an art form the attention it deserves and you still don't like it, fine, but don't become vindictive about it until you also become aware of what work and talent went into that particular art form and until you realize what purposes are behind that art form.

Seniors Win 1st Place In All Class Night

by Sue Blum

Saturday, March 24th, started out like a normal peaceful sunny day at Juniata College but behind the stone walls of Oller Hall things were brewing up for the biggest night(or the grossest, one might add) on campus: All Class Night.

Everyone seemed to be able to relate to what was portrayed in the plays in some way or another whether it be with Dr. Ronald Berry or the Bear, to the Ra, Ra cheerleaders of Hussey Terrace Dorm and the forever loved invention of the pill. In back of every little innocent face there is always a trace of may we call it, "mischief"!

Laughter ricocheted off the walls of Oller Hall as the curtain was drawn. First in the order of presentation was the Freshman class. For those of you who sit and mope in your rooms on these riproaring weekends at Juniata they posed the question, "What Good Is It Sitting Alone In Your Room?" The play was directed by Gup Cooper. It was a musical based upon the movie production, "Cabaret." The play was a comment on the morals of Juniata College starting off with an inexperienced Freshman approaching the realms of Juniata campus.

The next shocker on stage was the Sophomore class. As one ponders on their play one remembers the Freshman Floozie, an athletic supporter and an upperclass party goer. So you boys who need a lesson in how to pick up a girl or portray a sacred jock or groove at an upperclassmen party take it from the Sophomore class. The play portrayed the continuing process of increasingly involved romances throughout the years at Juniata. Everyone should have been able to identify with at least one of these romances for this was "Love Juniata Style" in its epitome. The directors were Gary Gillen and Wendy Bills.

After a brief intermission which might have seemed longer to those who anxiously awaited finding out "Everything You Always Wanted To Know About Sex at Juniata College But Were Afraid To Ask," starring the intellectual Junior class. The play was directed by Charlie Austin. Imagine a revolutionary sex survey at prim and proper Juniata College. The results of this imagining were seen on stage Saturday night.

The last class to present their twenty minute comedy were the seniors. Yes, All Class Night ended with the bigtime. For all you lovers of T.V. land, the senior class mock game shows were quite amusing. Two of our favorite Juniata students Hilda Humpwell and Peter Gozinya who did not have enough

A windup toy-boy who sprang all his sprungs much to the consternation of christianized society back in the early 1950's was an entertainment phenomenon called Elvis Presley. When the facination to see what he looked like became so obsessively devilish that constructive human behaviour eddied to a virtual stand-still in America, Presley was cleaned up a bit and exhibited on the circusy Ed Sullivan Show. For the safety of the Morality of the Nation though, the cameras focused steadily above his navel. What was happening beneath it, only God and the studo audience witnessed.

Alerted to this Temptation of the Flesh and unable to comprehand it's sensual power, the Guardians of civilized Needs and Necessities took out it's 5 pound package of cake flour and made us a sanitary substitute and called it (in the spirit of Heritage) Pat Boone. It didn't obscenely gyrate. It didn't have pimples and greasy skin. It was clean. It was presentable to God. It also didn't have the energy life force that is the Signature of the Ineffable One, which our windup toy-boy had). And so, the World turned, and then, turned ugly, and so now we have all sorts of terrible visions and Anti-Christs.

What has caused my deliberation on our two-faced approach to existing was the viewing of the late, great Walt Disney's latest confection to White America's plastic palate, "The World's Greatest Athlete". Someone's been in the flour sack again. This ersatz Tarzan is a pretty little thing with blond hair, a pet Tiger, a College girl friend named Jane (looking for all the world like a certain Linda Lovelace with the cleanup treatment), and a marvelous black God-Father played with rascality by Roscoe Lee Browne in a feathered fright wig. The boy is called Nanu as I figure they didn't have the gall to call him Tarzan. When I was eleven years old and movies were a nickel and one went every day for the daily bread of romantic illusion, Tarzan was played by a fantastic male person, always...my favorite being an actor named Bruce Bennet. Jane was some grownup girl person like Maureen Sullivan you could sink your teeth into (not suggestively vice-versa). Everything was played straight and once even Maria Ouspenskia did not think it beneath her classic dignity to play a Queen in a Tarzan Epic.

What grieves me is the continuing devaluation of the dollar of human awareness. The older generation has Sarah Bernhardt and Caruso to remember as figures to pattern a Heroic life after. The middle generation has Betty Boop cartoons and Jane Darwell to laugh at and be comforted by for a life wasted with doing what was considered right rather than what one wished too. The 30 year olds have Troy Donahue and the Mousequeteers (or however it was spelt) to peg a segment of their innocence onto, but Lord God, what about today?

When you are in your forties, is your damnation to be a childhood memory of Nanu, or Mr. Rogers, or Holly Woodlawns?

Lot's of luck.

I shall share a copy of your thoughtful letter with the editor of our college newspaper so that he may do with it as he chooses. If the editor should decide to publish a story about the letter, perhaps the student concerned will accept my invitation to come to see me so that I may tell her on a first-hand basis how much I appreciate her helpfulness to you and your gratitude to her.

At this writing, I have not had an opportunity to talk to Mr. Foster Ulrich about this but am certainly glad that he suggested writing to me as you have now done. Wounded Knee So What?

"But wait! They have guns. Somebody could get hurt. They might kill somebody. What is going on out there?

What is this? Land? Whose land? What land?

Fifty-five million acres! The Indians own it by treaty? And what ... they could possibly attempt to take this land by force if the government doesn't meet the designated treaty agreements?

Ah, what the hell. It doesn't matter to me. That's way out on some god-foresaken reservation, not around here.

What! Those fifty-five million acres are distributed throughout the United States?

And what? More Indians around the nation may result to similiar violent means for recognition of their cause?

It might happen here! Right here where I live! This is serious. We could be in danger.

Maybe we ought to look into this. . ."

All Class Night Party

March 26, 1973

Juniatian Editor:

Following the All Class Night presentation in Oller Hall Saturday night, a party was sponsored by the upperclassmen of Juniata at the Huntingdon Fairgrounds. This was billed to be the best gathering of its kind at Juniata in some time, and it did live up to everyone's expectations. Never in my year and a half at Juniata had I ever seen such a large proportion of the student population in one place in such a friendly and warm atmosphere. Although the general mood was one of mirth and celebration, I find it sad that in such a small college community with a potential for close relationships, it takes such a large impersonal gathering for people to lose their inhibitions.

During the course of the evening, I spoke with people I had not known before and some of whom I probably will never speak to again. Why must this be so? It seems that people are afraid of being held responsible for their actions on a day-to-day basis, and a large gathering may afford them the opportunity to open up temporarily. I don't know where the responsibility lies, and I realize this may be equally true of myself, but I still find it tragic that people must resort to artificial means to fulfill interpersonal needs. Perhaps this issue should be considered when criticizing the lack of social outlets at Juniata; instead we should turn our energy towards creating a more open and tolerant atmosphere.

Sincerely,
Carol McFate

In The Beginning, There Was Zuck

Brother Jacob M. Zuck came to Huntingdon in 1876 to start a Brethren College upon the request of J. B. Brumbaugh and Dr. A. B. Brumbaugh. Zuck was previously teaching in a public school at Mt. Pleasant, Maryland. When he was offered this teaching position, Zuck felt that it had great potential and he proved his assumption to be true.

On April 17, 1876, in a small room in the second story of the "Pilgram Building," with three students, Professor J. M. Zuck began what is now Juniata College. The three students were Miss Maggie Miller, Miss Rebecca Cornelius, and Mr. Gaius M. Brumbaugh. This class was the start of an eleven week term, which cost $6.50 for tuition and $3.00 for board. This small class of three lasted one term and was followed the next term by a dozen students. Juniata continued to grow in student population and it's teaching staff.

where Zeno taught and consequently originated a concept later known as stoacism. The Painted Stoa was one of the first original public museums. Housed within it were several painting collections including mural scenes of the Marathon Battle. Dr. Benjamin pointed out that this particular stoa housed not only paintings but also artisans and 'kooks' of the time.

The city of Athens was destroyed several times and the University usually took the brunt of these devastations. Acording to Dr. Benjamin, the Roman emperior Hadrian dedicated himself to rebuilding the University after its destruction and refounded Athens as a university city becoming one of the library's biggest patrons in the process.

The era of the great Athenian University came to an end in 529 A.D. when the Roman emperor Justinian, forbade the teaching of philosophy and law, the cornerstones of the university's greatness.

WANT TO BECOME AN AIR TRAFFIC CONTROL TOWER OPERATOR?

"Tower, this is Army 804, requesting landing instructions."

"Army 804, you are cleared to land on runway three-zero west."

The reassuring voice from the tower belongs to a competent young man or woman trained as an air traffic control tower operator at the U.S. Army Aviation School, Ft. Rucker, Ala.

This 13-week school instructs Army men and women in the methods and working positions of a VFR (visual flight rules) control tower. Academic subjects give students a broad background knowledge of air traffic control operations and procedures necessary to qualify them as control tower operators, in accordance with Federal Aviation Agency regulations.

Control towers at Army airfields throughout the world are manned by graduates of this school. With the rapid growth of civilian and commercial flying, the Federal Aviation Agency is constantly in need of trained personnel. Many of those trained as air traffic control tower operators by the Army's Aviation School join the FAA as civilian employees upon completion of their military service.

The Army offers young men and women training of their choice in more than 300 skills, many of which will meet the needs of the future. Further information about the opportunities offered by the U.S. Army can be obtained from Sergeant Daniel Dohring at 521 Washington St., Huntingdon, Pa. 16652 or by calling 643-1667.

Donnie Williams Named Rookie Of The Year

by Tony Martuzas

Monday morning, March 26, Terry Engdahl received word that Juniata's Donnie Williams has been elected as the ESAS (Division 2) "Rookie of the Year". The first division is made up of Penn State, West Va., and other schools of that size while the second division is made up of Assumption, Gettsburg, Wilkes, Juniata, etc. The 6-5 frosh from Wilkinsburg High (Pittsburgh) also made honorable mention for the MAC North division. During the past basketball season, Donnie pulled down 303 rebounds (a school record,) lead the team in scoring (339) with a 15.4 points per game average. Donnie is still uncertain about remaining at Juniata, in an article next week I'll go into depth what's really troubling the talented forward, and hopefully we'll examine the attitude of the four other frosh who demonstrated their ability over the past season.

"New Lib Unit" Performs Tues. In Oller Hall

On April 2 in Oller Hall, as part of Juniata College Artist Series, the "New Liberation Art Unit" will perform at 8:00. Complimentary tickets are available at the information desk in Ellis Hall.

The "New Liberation Art Unit", formerly the New Jazz Ensemble" feels that their music which is an art form, is similar to dance, and they often perform using a dancer. The unit emphasizes that liberation is their purpose for their music. They believe that freedom, in one form or another is the basic desire of all people.

George Taylor lends the group of highly talented musicians. He is also a composer and woodwind instrumentalist. The group performs all original material. John Blake, another composer plays both the violin and the piano. Kenneth Kellem, who studied at the Philadelphia Music Academy plays the bass, and Emanuel Thompson plays the drums.

Racket Raising Report

by Ellen Humphries

Labs, Slices, Aces, and Talent are springing from this year's tennis team. A group of top-notch freshmen along with the return of five strong lettermen makes this year's season look promising. Due to the depth of the team, competition for starting positions already has proven strong.

Freshman Gavin Ford has already moved to third position and seniors Al Stout and Pat White (captain) are definite starters. With help from returning senior John Bowser, sophomore Andy Vonderheyde, and two good looking freshmen prospects Rick Bechtolt, and Mont Rice. Coach Dr. Ernie Post looks for a Racket Raising season.

Let's give the team support and watch the first home game next Wednesday when Juniata will be stroking against Indiana.

The shows were "The New Price is Right", "Beat the Clock", "Let's Make a Deal", and the "Dating Game," or as we saw them "Let's Cop a Feel" Game" with its host Jerry Blewis with Horny Hall and the "Mating Game" and so on.

With the closing of the senior class play another All Class Night came to an end but the class play of "73" will go down in history as the winner of this 36th annual riproaring All Class Night.

WJC Announces Free Airplay For S. G. Position

by Tony Martuzas

WJC will offer to each student who is running for a Student Government (e.g., Vice-President of a class, Vice-President SG, etc.), 2 30 second spots per day for any candidate. There will be no preference in programing, that is, no student can demand his spot to be played twice during lunch, it will be indiscriminately logged, the dj will play only, and only the spot logged, which is analagous to a dj playing an extra advertisement (they're not allowed because we don't want to give a certain store more spots than necessary.

However, if a candidate wishes additional airplay, we'll give his an additional 30 seconds for 25 cents (non-prime time), and it will cost 50 cents between the hours of 7-11 p.m. We will not give this air time out to all candidates automatically, to get it, you must contact Jim Pye at the station. We also do not want a candidate to coerce a dj to play his spot when it is not logged, such actions may force us to take away his spot. WJC plans to give equal (free) airplay to all candidates, any additional will be at a cost.

Runners Prepare For Busy Season

Fourteen returning lettermen, including some key individuals make the track and field outlook bright. The Juniata cindermen finished 8-2 a year ago and were second in the end of year Middle Atlantic Conference meet.

Coach Rossi is looking to equal or better the 1972 record and is thinking about unseating MAC titlist Widener in the annual outdoor meet later this spring.

"We will definitely be strong in the jumping events," the coach said. "And we have some strength in the 220 yard to half mile races," he added.

The Juniata relay quintets are also in a position to provide points while the field events are adequate and, according to Rossi, "with a little bit of luck, could be pretty good."

Four individual Juniata record holders are among the 1973 returnees. They are: Carl Koval, 880 yard run; Joe Coradetti, 440 yard intermediate hurdles; Bob Zimmerman, pole vault; and Mark Dincher, discus.

Basketball Comes to JC

The Triumph Of Rowdy

by Steve Townsend

There were no ABC cameras, no court side dramtics from Howard Cosell, and it certainly wasn't the Palestra. But there were two new score clocks, and the officials table has been relocated to face the entrance. For the Philadelphia Textile basket squad it surely wasn't home, but it was the best Juniata could offer. By 6:30 P.M. it had become obvious that the college was on the brink of the social, and maybe even the sport event of the season.

"Hundred, Hundred!" The shout rose from the crowd mid-way through the second period of the preliminary contest. For lack of any better opponent, the JV's had scheduled Puritan Sportswear, a strictly pick-up bunch from some lost merchantile league in Altoona. With just seconds left, point number one hundred trickled through the net and found its seat of honor high above the gym. Instantly a yelp of triumph shot to the rafters and blended with the final buzzer as the crowds wish was fulfilled. As Sportswear rambled to the shower, one couldn't help but wonder if the game was really serious. The only missing element was Fred McMurry spreading flubber on the bottom of their sneakers.

Ten minutes before big game time, the home crowd began to arrive in force. A half a dozen vocal Textile fans in plastic, white sox batting helments, had already made their presence known during the previous fiasco. The status this game held in the minds of Juniata was apparent from their dress. Hounds tooth tweed, arguile sox, high neck sweaters, and suede bucks were standard costume. Afterall, they felt obligated to show Philly that this was not a hick college. As the game began, the contrasts between home fans and the enemy's handful became quite obvious. Originally the small group's toy batting caps and loose T-shirts cast a shadow of ridiculousness over the ivy style outfits of the rest of the gathering. One could see that these guys were into some good ol' American rowdiness through the fact that they made more noise than anybody else in the gym. By the time Donny Williams was fouled at 15:35 of the first half which resulted in the Indians first two points, this group's cry of, "Elevator, elevator. We got the shaft." distinctly established their surpremecy.

Half time arrived with as much relief as the opening tip off was anticipated. The Indians left the court knowing they were outclassed, but still hopeful enough to mastermind the plan for the greatest upset in Juniata's sports history. The loyal fans headed for the concession stand, not really hungry, but bent on impressing someone. And finally, our boisterous bunch from Textile strutted to the lobby for a smoke and found some high leved entertainment over the scorecard proclaiming "Tom Rinaldi's Career." Inside, the loudspeakers were blaring out the chords of Janis Joplin and War as the two teams broke from the lockers for a little warming up before the duel resumed. The buzzer sounded and War was abruptly chocked off about twelve bars into the second song of the tape. Being so conditioned from hundreds of other games, this sudden absence of sound brought the last of the nicotine crew wandering toward their seats enteranced in the usual basketball hypnosis.

Needless to say the second half proceeded much the same as had the first, Textile being in the right place most of the time, and the Indians found themselves orbiting around a defense not unlike the Great China Wall. By the game's finish no one wanted to count the point spread, so the scorers obliged by shutting off the clocks almost instantly. Along with the clocks went the home fans, a little disappointed, the Indians, a little frustrated, Textile, a little bored, the rowdies, a little boisterous, and Puritan Sportswear, a little ripped off.

Black French Literature To Be Discussed

by Patrick E. Fleagle

Dr. Robert G. Lewis, Professor of French at New York State University at Brockport, will present an illustrated lecture on the theme "Black Literature in French." The lecture will be held in Showmaker Galleries on Thursday, March 29, at 8:00 P.M. The lecture is sponsored by DivisionI and Co-sponsered by the Foreign Language Department. The lecture will be in English and students, faculty, and the public are cordially invited to attend. There will be a reception immediately following the illustrated lecture.

Dr. Lewis is a graduate of the University of North Carolina and has taught at Juniata, North Carolina, and Duke University. He has done original research in the area of Black Literature in French and has travelled to Martinique and North Africa in his research efforts. The subject of Black French Literature has become "quite a rage", according to Dr. Guss of the Classics Department, and quite a few universities are now offering courses in the subject.,

JC and Hunt. Accumulate $2,000 For Easter Seals Over Weekend

by Sam Simanni

To fight a disease, good intentions are not enough. The real hero in man's never ending battle against sickness is the almighty buck. For one moment the dollar sign changes from a shadow of power to a ray of hope. This small miracle happens many times throughout the year. From town to city, country to state and even nation to nation, men of all walks of life and views join for one goal, the triumph of man over illness and disaster.

To many of us, this miracle doesn't occur very close to home. Sure, we see on television of listen to the large national telethons, but usually never anything small, or better yet, student run, happens. Well, this weekend, the miracle of the dollar sign occured in Huntingdon in the shape of the "Twelfth of Easter," Easter Seals' 12 hour telethon of channel 12, but this miracle had another part of it that made it unique. The college radio station, WJC, under the direction of Jim Pye, Tony Martuzas, and other members of the board planned and executed a student-run marathon which started at 12:00 Friday Noon, and ended 6:00 Sunday evening. Broadcasting live from Ellis Hall, which stayed open all weekend, dedicated student DJs donated their time and effort to help raise money for the Easter Seals Foundation.

The miracle of the dollar sign woke up the campus to a cause. A cause that left everybody a little happier after they contributed. The food service donated doughnuts and coffee, for all the DJs that stayed up during the wee-hours of the morning on Saturday and Sunday. The Student Government passed the hat at the showing of "Butch Cassidy and the Sundance Kid" on Friday evening. The Sophomore class donated their proceeds from the 1950's dance, and the whole student body just opened their wallets to help children and adults who are handicapped.

Besides the marathon, the radio station also did some canvassing of the campus community. Many of our great faculty came through for this glorious campaign against disease. But, the love that filled Juniata's heart this weekend did not stop at the marathon. Many

by Kevin Healey

Between March 28th and April 1st, the Intercollegiate Association of Women's students held their annual national convention. Three Juniata College women participated in leading roles.

Miss. J. Eileen Flieg, of Nesconset, New York, a senior at Juniata, was chairwoman at the National conference. Serving as committee chairwomen were Miss. May Roberts, a senior from Gettysburg, and Miss Faith Shoemaker, a sophmore from Warrington.

"Expanding Human Awareness" was the theme for the I.A.W.S. national convention. Over 200,000 women students in the United States are represented by this national organization. Sheila Tobias, Associate Provost at Wesleyan University, spoke to the delegates at the conference on institutional barriers and repressive academic environments. Dr. Bernice Sandler and Miss Margaret Dunkle from the Associations of American Colleges delivered talks on strategy for changing descrimination against women.

Miss Flieg, a history major and member of the college's board of trustees, serves as chairwomen of Juniata's Hybuata's Womens' student government. Miss Roberts and Miss Shoemaker are both members of the Juniata's Women's Government. Roberts, psychology major coordinated the program publishing for the convention, while Shoemaker, a student in the Philosophy of Science is a member of the secretariat and in charge of printing.

Were Things Different During JC Twirp Week?

by Robert Lopresti

Jean Shepherd, a semi-philosopher, once referred to Spring as "the nutty season". No other season causes behavior so strange that it has a special name—there is no such thing as "winter fever." Spring is when the swallows come back to Capistrano, the flowers bloom like madness, and a young man's fancy turns to thoughts of you-know-what.

All of this brings me to the subject, a prime example of the nutty season: Juniata's Twirp Week. It began on the fifth day of Spring and ended on April Fool's Day.

Twirp stands for The Woman Is Required To Pay. It is an old JC tradition, like the Storming of the Arch and All Class Night, and it is almost as logical.

Twirp Week is supposed to be the time when the rules are switched: the girls are supposed to ask out the boys. I took a poll among people I know to see who was a twirpee. Sure enough, some boys were asked, and usually this meant a treat to Butch Cassidy, or the sock hop, at the girl's expense. But I discovered that there had been a lot of male chauvinist anti-twirping going on. I mean several men reported they thought they were about to be asked, so they asked first.

Of course, not everyone who was asked said "yes". Some boys claimed they had to stay home to wash their hair.

So what happened? Most of the people who usually date had dates, those who don't, didn't. There was not much change, except perhaps in attitude. The boys had a chance to kifow what it's like to "only sit and wait", and some learned what it's like to have ten seconds to make up your mind to answer yes or no. The girls were put in the position of making the first move. It was a chance to learn why the other sex acts like it does.

In Ellis Hall under a Twirp Week sign someone put up a poster suggesting: "How about a week when the boys ask the girls out?" Some graffiti-artist added: "How about a week when the girls accept?"

Those are two good suggestions, I think. And who knows? In the nutty season, even one of them might happen.

Lenten Services To Be Held April 10

An All Campus Worship Service for Lent, featuring the Covenant Players, will be held Tuesday, April 10, at 8:00 P.M. in Ellis Ballroom.

The Covenant Players, an international repertory drama group, was established in 1963. In the interest of offering drama as a means of communication, they have been presenting motivational drama throughout the United States, Canada, Europe, and South East Asia under the direction of Charles M. Tanner.

The Covenant Players offer an exciting approach to contemporary society and its problems. Their program is designed to relate Christianity to our modern world. This is achieved through a series of one-act plays and shorter vignettes of varied dramatic forms, including humor, mystery, intrigue, fantasy, and science fiction. Their purpose is to awaken people to what is going on around them, and to generate among them a more exciting, deep, and purposeful committment to their place in these activities.

Black French Literature Discussed By Dr. Lewis

by Patrick E. Fleagle

Dr. Robert Lewis, Professor of French at New York State University at Brockport, recently presented an illustrated lecture to a Shoemaker Galleries audience on the subject of Black French Literature. Dr. Lewis, who formerly taught at Juniata College, has done original research on the lecture topic and has travelled to Martinique and North Africa in his research efforts.

Professor Lewis began his presentation by clearing up some popular misconceptions about the African continent. Although the continent has vast deserts and jungles, Africa is covered mainly by savannah, a grasslands plains area. Dr. Lewis's slide presentation also included a servey of everyday life scenes of the indigenous population.

Black French Literature, according to Dr. Lewis, had one of its earliest starts in Nineteenth-century Haiti. Because these particular writers did not want their readers to know of their blackness, they often fashioned their works after the style of Western writers. The Twentieth century showed profound changes in Black French Literature. No little influence on these black writers was the American Black experience of the 1920's. During this time, American blacks, through the efforts of W.E.B. DuBois acquired a new awareness which gradually filtered to other black populations.

According to Dr. Lewis, 1921 marked the launching point of Black French Literature when the black writer Marent won France's highest literary honor, the Goncourt award. Marent's writings shocked the French bureaucracy when he challenged France's colonial presence. The cause of Black literary awareness was further advanced by the creation in the 1930's of Black Student, a black literary magazine in Paris. Arising from this and other literary efforts was the concept of Negritude, black awareness. Dr. Lewis explained that by the very nature of this movement in a colonial setting it became a somewhat militant organization.

The psychology of a colonial country bears very heavily in its effects on the Black French Literature, according to Dr. Lewis. The frustration and inward hatred of a foreign bureaucracy causes the theme of "individual worth" to be a very prevelant one in the literature. The Black French theater reflects the social issues of the time and is both traditional and contemporary in presentation. Black French poetry, mainly an oral form, runs the full gamut of subject areas. According to Dr. Lewis, while the poetry often uses western devices, the content is very different from that of Western poets. Professor Lewis also stressed that these Western devices were often necessarily copied in much Black French literature because many of the writers must go to Western universities to receive an education.

Jose Greco To Perform Friday

by Ron Mowen

On January 30th Jose Greco walked on stage in Williamstown, Mass. to open his twentieth annual tour across the United States. This is a record for consecutive tours in America that is unmatched in the history of dance companies.

The record-making season will take The Jose Greco Company of Spanish Dancers, Musicians and Singers to more than sixty cities throughout the country. By June 2nd when the tour ends, the company will have performed for an audience of over a quarter of a million.

The company's 1973 program has been conceived, choreographed and directed by Greco and Nana Lorca. The program gives equal emphasis to the Spanish classical dance and the regional and flamenco dances. The entire production is under the musical direction of the renowned Spanish composer-pianist Roger Machado who has been associated with Greco since 1950. Also featured in the production is classical guitarist Pablo Marchena.

Two totally new works, both composed by Machado, are being introduced. Senorita Lorca is presenting a solo performance in "Garbo de Andalucia." "Danza del Gato" features Greco in a "farruca" (a Spanish dance form that forcefully expresses the masculinity of the Spaniard) and according to advance word, the solo performance is another Greco show-stopper.

The company will be making a stop at JC on April 6. Their Hispanic show will begin at 8:00 P.M. in Oller Hall.

Spring IMs Are Underway

by Vernne L. Wetzel

Spring intramurals really got underway on Monday of this week. Men's and women's softball both seemed to be favorites, although there will be plenty of tennis and badminton action. Another tournament of team handball has also gotten underway. First of all, we should do the winter IM tournaments justice and give a final report on handball and paddleball. All three tournaments (handball singles and doubles, and paddleball) were dominated by two contestants — Bill Berrier and Lou Eckerl. The two of them teamed up to win the handball doubles, and Bill Berrier defeated Lou Eckerl at the end of the season to win the handball singles tournament. Lou led the paddleball tournament throughout most of the competition and held on to win that tournament.

All of the action last week was centered on team handball. Last Monday, there were two games: Roadrunners 21— No Names 20 and Winners III 22— Close Windows 20. On Tuesday of last week the Arch Men won over the Nads by forfeit, and Moosers defeated Abadie 21-14. On Wednesday one game was played with the results — Close Windows 23 — Roadrunner 15, and also, all remaining games scheduled for the Nads were cancelled; players on other teams should take note of this. On Thursday there were two games: Abadie 24 — Arch Men 23, and Moosers 24 — No Name 15. The team standings as of Friday were:

No Name	2	2
Close Windows	2	2
Abadie	2	2
Roadrunners	1	3
Arch Men	0	3

A rather interesting intramural event is scheduled for May 17th — the All-College Invitational Track Meet. I've never been to an All-College Invitational Track Meet, so I'm interested in seeing what happens. This one is scheduled for 6:00 P.M. on a Thursday nite, and it's open to all students — men and women, and a special invitation is given to faculty members to participate. There will be 14 events; for women, there will be a 50-yd. dash, 220-yd. dash, 120 yd. low hurdles, 880 relay, softball throw, and a high jump event. For men, there will be the 100-yd., 440-yd., 880-yd. relay, 120-yd. low hurdles, the shot, and also the high jump. For co-rec. there will be the 880-yd. relay, and a 440-yd. relay. (co-rec. consists of 2 men and 2 women on a team.) There will be champions, and individual champions in each event will be recognions in each event will be recognized. This Track Meet sounds like it's going to be a lot of fun. Detailed information will be issued to each student sometime in the middle of this month, so keep it in mind.

Scholarships—

aid programs determine student eligibility on the basis of the family's ability to pay college costs and the cost of the college attended. Under BOG, the cost of the student's college would not be considered at all.

The Education Amendments of 1972 provided for continuation of our present EOG, NDSL, CWS student aid programs, and the amendments formulated the nw BOG Program. This slate of programs could provide the best means for equal educational opportunity in our nation's history. Elimination of any of the programs would mean that many persons who would seek higher education would be denied the opportunity because of inability to meet educational costs.

Ronald L. Shunk

Wanted: Sports Editor

Dear Juniata Students,

If you want a Sports page, or for that matter a newspaper, I suggest that you pitch in and apply the skills that you supposedly acquired through Juniata's writing program. I am hanging it up as Sports Editor for the Juniatian; I'm now going to divert my energies to a more worthwhile organization— WJC (I happen to be the Program Director). Besides, I plan to run for Senator, which should be a very busy job.

I didn't mind writing sports articles every now and then; as Sports Editor I was told my job was to assign articles— easy! Except I found myself writing half the Sports page due to a lack of reporters (except Vernne Wetzel). The only decent article I had the entire year was one from Steve Townsend; I was sick and tired of getting the same old boring Sports Reporting. "Well, we played them, and they beat us by 30 points, and our high scorer was—, and their high scorer was—," articles written without one spark of imagination (except for a recent tennis article).

I even was a little adventurous with an article which looked like a "Cinderella" story, except that I threw in an honest remark ("our talented forward may not be back next year"). Sorry for the shocking revelation, but isn't reporting aimed at spreading some sort of truth? I even have some interesting remarks about our next year's football team which should win the MAC Northern Division, but that's beyond this "letter of resignation".

If I sound disgusted, maybe it's because I failed in organizing a decent Sports page. So I might as well concentrate on something worthwhile, the radio station. We're still in the process of preparing for next year by getting Public Service Announcements, Commercial Advertising, and a professional news service (ABC, the one WQWK uses).

I'll be glad to do a couple Sports articles, since I do love writing (or at least I'm still trying). I just hope somebody out there has some time to donate to the Juniatian.

Donnie And The Rest Will Be Back Next Year

by Tony Martuzas

Some things have happened since Donnie's indecision about returning, and it looks as though the ECAC (not ESAS) "Rookie of the Year" will be back, along with the four other talented freshmen. I feared they would run into academic trouble (who isn't?) and maybe they'd join the trend of a lot of students I know— transfer. Just because they're athletes doesn't mean they're isolated from the rest of the campus. If the school's a "drag", then some students will leave. Also, since three-fifths of the talented freshmen are black, they just might run into some kind of discrimination by the remaining white majority of this school. To date, I do not know of any such incidents.

Bobbie Carles, the second leading scorer for this year's team (14.7ppg ave.) needless to say, has learned a lot, and he wants to display what he has learned this year for the next basketball season. Robbie is experiencing some academic difficulty, but again, who isn't? (Especially me).

Oscar ("Rickey") Hatchett, the guard with 1001 moves (although he rarely displayed them) will definitely be back.

Tim Tabor, second in rebounds and third in team scoring (12.0 ppg ave.) is the most content of the five. He's having no difficulty in academics and he even had a chance to display his acting talents during the recent freshman play for ALL CLASS NITE. "Tabes" will be a force to be reckon with for next year's squad.

Don Martin, a 6-5 forward from Pequea, Pa., was sensational during the few JV games he played. When he was elevated to varsity, he chipped in 200 points (8.5 ppg ave.) and was thirty-eight rebounds behind Tabes 182. Don looked a little shakey at first, but with 21 games behind him, he'll know what to expect next year.

And finally, Donnie Williams, Juniata's very own rookie of the year. Donnie was going to "pack his bags" and leave this school immediately after the thrashing by the fourth best small college in America, before a very pacified "home court advantage". Usually if a school is having even a mediocre season (6-16 isn't mediocre), the fans will back them up, but I sympathize for the impatient Juniata students who would like to support a winner. I felt so helpless watching our team get destroyed by Marty Fricko and Bill Banks (Textile) domination under the boards, and even little Ed Swift had the audacity to drive to the hoop.

So if Donnie keeps his aid (despite Nixon's drastic cutbacks), stays away from Physical Chemistry and Calculus IV, and if he finds "fun" here at "good ol' JC", he'll be back.

Scholarships In Jeopardy Next Year

I would like to provide some additional commentary in response to Mr. Siedzikowski's editorial about federal student financial aid programs in your issue of February 21. First, let me say that the information in that editorial is quite correct and his estimation that many student's educational opportunity could be in jeopardy is very realistic.

However, the Education Opportunity Grant Program is not the only student aid program in jeopardy. President Nixon's proposed budget would also eliminate the National Direct Student Loan Program, and it would reduce fundage for the College Work-Study Program by $20 million. On our campus, eliminated programs could affect some 375 students.

The national picture would show that some $210 million was appropriated for the EOG program, $310 million for NDSL, and $270 million for CWS for the present academic year. This fundage was devoted to aid for needy students. Next year's requested budget, if approved, would provide no fundage for either NDSL and only $250 million for CWS. This, of course, would bring about a drastic revision in campus-based aid programs.

The Basic Opportunity Grant Program, BOG, has been proposed by President Nixon to replace the former aid programs. Federal legislation requires that the EOG, NDSL and CWS Programs be maintained at their present (1972-73) levels before the BOG Program can be funded. However, President Nixon has chosen to ignore the legislative intent and fund the BOG Program to the exclusion of former aid programs. The BOG Program and student loan guaranty program would then become THE federal federal student financial aid programs.

The BOG Program has a proposed budget of $622 million. On the surface it appears that this program would be funded with more dollars than the programs proposed to be eliminated, and, therefore, it would be of greater aid to students. However, many more students would be eligible for BOG than are eligible for the present aid programs. Present programs are limited to students attending accredited institutions of higher education. The BOG Program would be available to students attending many forms of trade, technical, and business schools. This broadening of the student base to include many more students than presently receive federal aid would have an effect on the amount of each student's possible BOG. The BOG Program would provide a maximum award of $1400 per student, but it appears doubtful that many students will receive that amount because of the large number of potentially eligible students.

The most important feature of the BOG Program with regard to student entitlement is the method of determing eligibility for the award. Each student could receive up to $1400 based upon the family's ability to pay college costs. That ability to pay is based upon a need analysis formula, and the student's award would be determined by subsracting the computed family contribution from the $1400 figure. This differs greatly from the award determination of present programs. Present signed himself. The other members of the class and I made this decision collectively after hearing the writer's case. He did not fail the course, he did graduate.

I assume that holding a person responsible for a contract to which he knowingly and willingly assents and that holding an open hearing in which both parties of the contract present their cases to a set of the plaintiff's peer group, who ultimately make the decision, is fair and indeed part of what education and independent study is all about.

Sir:

There is a certain silliness that inflicts itself upon young people in Springtime, even upon college newspaper editors. Thus in reply to my question as to whether Lime might not be a Trojan effusion, you assured me — and hundreds of gullible readers — that there really is an Edward Kinchley Evans and that, further, given the job he holds, he must know something about writing. Really.

My immediate reaction was to challenge you, if such a person there be, to print his picture. But then I laughed as I realized that you would probably hunt through your files till you found a snap of someone roughly in his middle years, looking "hip," and sporting a beard, and then you would print that, saying, "This is Edward Kinchley Evans." No thanks. Juniatians are not fooled that easily.

Says "Evans." in the same issue as my letter (and there you are clever— Evans is a real writer in the same issue as my note), "One of the most aggravating enigmas of the human heart is the aberration we clinically label 'romantic love' and justly think we have safely isolated it from the rest of our experiences." Don't tell me that a real person (unless it be "funning Jack") wrote that. A real writer would have said something like "Romantic love is a puzzle: even those who opt to scorn it find it sliding back into their lives." Real writers don't inflate.

Nor do they call enigmas "aggravating" (getting heavier). Nor does "romantic love" seem to them quite as clinical a label as, for instance, "displaced autoeroticism" might. Now that's clinical! Nor would they say that we "justly think" we have isolated something when the whole point is that we have not isolated it. Nor do they call a normal state in the adolescent, an immature but still normal state, an aberration. Unlike sadism, masochism, and catalepsy, romantic love is a normal part of the process of growing up.

And you told me that there was really a writer named Edward Kinchley Evans. Henry F. Siedzikowski, you old son of a gun!

Paranoically,

All Class Night

I would like to register my disgust, as many others have, concerning the manner in which sex was portrayed at All Class Night.

Sex is really beautiful. It helps to draw people together in many mental, emotional and physical ways. As a matter of fact, it's creation is probably one of the best things that's happened to this world.

At All Class Night sex was portrayed in an extremely crude manner. After the drunks in the audience finally quieted down one was able to catch bits and pieces of what in many cases was a crass script. If the writers felt, the only way to elicit audience response was through gross statements, they have some awful warped senses of "humor". Many of the gesticulations were also of a crude mature. It seemed that the whole purpose of the play-wright and directors was to incorporate anything gross or rude, that was normally considered taboo or in "poor taste" by the majority of the student body.

All Class Night has degenerated in the last four years that I've been at J.C., to an extremely low and vulgar level. Is this what you want from All Class Night? Do you ever yearn for a good production like that of last years' sophomores? Should some types of restrictions be imposed and inforced? NO! NO? Then God have mercy upon us.

Eye To Eye With Harrison

Juniata's newest addition to the Psychology Department is Michael H. Harrison. Mr. Harrison started at J.C. at the beginning of this year following his work as a part-time instructor at the University of Pennsylvania.

Michael Harrison, a native of Canada, was born in Montreal where his parents still reside. His undergraduate studies were done at McGill University in Montreal. Mr. Harrison graduated in 1968 with First Class Honors in Psychology. The following year, he shifted his studying south into the U.S. and attended the University of Pennsylvania in Philadelphia. He received his Master's Degree in Phychology in 1969, then continued his studies at U. of P. through 1972. Mr. Harrison is now working on his Doctoral thesis which involves nonverbal communication and violence. This topic is based on the use of senses other than speech. One example is the unconscious use of eye contact in communicating.

Previous to Mr. Harrison's coming to Juniata, he had experience in psychological research. He served as a research assistant at both McGill University and at the U. of P.

During his stay at the University of Pennsylvania, Mr. Harrison and a fellow graduate student, Albert Pepitone, did a study to see if it were true that policemen carrying a revolver in a rio situation do more clubbing, prodding, and macing of protestors than those who do not. After experimentation and research, the two men concluded that a policeman carrying a revolver and a night stick is likely to do more damage with the night stick than a policeman carrying just a night stick. They discovered that carrying both a deadly revolver, and a night stick, a policeman permitted to use only the night stick will use it with more damaging blows than a policeman with only the night stick and not the revolver. A few years after their research was completed, their results were published in the "Journal of Personality and Social Psychology" Volume 23 No. 3. Following this publishing, the monthly magazine "Psychology Today" did an article on Mr. Harrison and Mr. Pepitone's work. This article appeared in the December 1972 issue. Their research proved to be an important accomplishment.

In a recent interview with Mr. Harrison, I learned that he is teaching Experimental Social Phychology and one segment of Intro. to Phychology this term. He said that he hopes to teach a Freshman Seminar on non-verbal communication next year.

Gambling Comes to JC

It has come to my attention that gambling has now become a favorite pastime here at JC, not gambling in the usual sense of the word, as is typified by cards, smoke-filled pool halls, and lecherous women, but typified by slot machines.

As any simpleton can tell you, slot machines are a poor way to gamble. The rate of return on your gambling dollar is very low, and in the case of Juniata's slots, almost nil. But it is a great money-maker for the businesses, casinos, Mafia families, and other interested parties.

By now, if you are a steel nerved gambler, your coin pocket is tingling with anticipation of pecuniary gains to be made in a somewhat ilicit manner. The slot machines at JC don't operate like that, sorry! The slots in question are the machines found in most every dorm recreation room on campus. They are the machines that we hope will deliver us the "munchies" (a word originating from the Chollo word "munchero", meaning a food used to destroy a ravenous appetitie before eating a horrendous meal. Catch on, Food Service!) that our very lives depend on.

You may not think that the Servomation vending machines are gambling devices. But they are, in the true sense of the word.

Every time you place one of your hard earned (or hard begged) coins into the slot, you are taking the chance that you will never receive adequate compensation for your money. Sometimes, I will admit, one wonders whether the product that falls to your grasp is worth the money that you spent to procure it.

The crux of my argument is this: Something should be done about the condition of these machines. Using the vending machines should be not like a trip to Caesar's Palace, but a fair trade, your money for a fair amount of some product.

Many times the machines placed into use in a college situation are relics of bygone eras. This is because the damage incurred in a dorm, or other college location, is somewhat greater than in any more normal location. Vending machines are very expensive pieces of machinery. Vending machine firms (Mafia run or not) see no need to let their best examples of the vending machine state of the art go to waste at the hands of a vandalous mob. So, on the bad examples set by a few miscreants, we, the more honest (No college student is totally honest. If he was, he wouldn't be in college.) group of people, are penalized through the placement of derelict vending machines. If only those people caught defacing the machines were suitably punished, then maybe the vending machine companies would take note and put in new, honest, efficient machines.

So, if you see somebody mistreating a machine, punch him in the mouth. The dime, quarter, or nickel you save may be your own.

I am the professor (she) referred to in the anonymous letter entitled "Credit By Exam" on page 3 of the March 21 edition of the Juniatian.

While the writer does in no way falsify facts, he has omitted other relevant facts to which I should like to draw your attention.

The course requirements included an agreement that each member of the class attend all meetings of the class without exception. Failure to meet any requirement resulted automatically in failure. The writer was aware of this requirement; he accepted the contract willingly and knowingly as did other class members. Two pre-sessions were held before formal classes began in which the members of the class were invited to discuss and debate the requirements. The writer was informed of such meetings, he did not attend.

The writer did miss one and one-half of the classes. The reasons he gave to me both times was that he had overslept (the class met at 11:00).

Editorial

For those who complain that nothing ever happens at Juniata College, this week something exciting will be happening. The only condition is that you might have to remind yourself that you're here to learn something.

The aforementioned happening will be a philosophy symposium on the limits of Civil Disobedience. Three top scholars in the field will be here, and with a little student participation this could turn into an excellent educational opportunity for all involved.

These men will be here Wednesday, Thursday and Friday, April 4, 5 and 6. Each will conduct seminars at various times and visit a number of classes. Exact schedules for the symposium can be obtained around campus or by seeing Dr. Hartman.

If anyone out there is sincerely interested in their education, you'll make it a point to meet and talk with these men at one time or another. I wonder if this will be as well attended as colloquy.

Last weekend, the Easter Seals campaign was going full force in Huntingdon. Their goal was $1200 and they collected more than $2000. WJC held a marathon and numerous other organizations contributed time and money to this worthwhile cause. I believe they all deserve a salute from the entire campus community.

Editor's note:

In my last editorial on the All Class Night judges, I made the statement that there was no alumni representative among them. I had gotten this information from a usually reliable source, and I neglected to check its accuracy. I have now been informed that this was not true and I wish to apologize to Center Board for the mistake.

Marathon—

students gave up a free Saturday afternoon to go downtown and work with the telethon. One of these students was Eric Barton who donated many hours planning the telethon with Ted and Ruth Reinhart, the originators of the telethon.

The Easter Seals Foundation had set as their goal $1,200. We are glad to inform the campus community that the final amount, as of 12:30 A.M. Sunday, was over $2,000. WJC collected over $100, JC Student Government collected over $80, and the Sophomore Class collected over $25.

The marathon was a great success not only because of the money collected but also because it was student run. Nothing could have happened if it were not for you, the campus community of Juniata and your truly generous hearts.

Easter Seals and Sophomores Bring R & R Greasers To Dance

by Rick Boyer

Remember the Stroll? The Twist? How about sock hops in general? Unless you're within the age group of 28-35 years, you've probably never experienced this kind of phenomenon when it was THE thing. In order for us current college students to reap the benefits of early rock and roll, we must rely on various kinds of R&R "revivals" to satisfy our lust.

On Saturday night, the opportunity was provided for indulgence into 1950's and early '60's rock and roll. Sponsored by the Sophomore class, the sock hop was a total success for everyone who attended. Despite the fact that few people showed for its beginning at 8:30, the action picked up considerably around ten o'clock. By eleven, the Ellis Hall Ballroom was packed with dancers groovin' to those classic oldies.

There's not much a reporter can say about an event like this. A list of song titles would be rather meaningless in terms of describing the sheer joy and the franfic, chaotic atmosphere that these dances generate. All the old favorite musicians were featured on record including Chuck Berry, Chubby Checker, Jerry Lee Lewis, Carl Perkins, Bill Haley and the Comets, and the Beach Boys. You name it. Some students who dressed up as greasers, including MC Tony Martuzas, managed to preserve some of the '50's spirit. This and a couple of dance contests highlighted the evening. Ellen Humphries and Rich Hatch were among the winners in these contests and were awarded a Chuck Berry and Rick Nelson album respectively. Aside from all the good vibes, the Sophomore class raised twenty-five bucks from the proceeds for the Easter Seals Fund and The Huntingdon Society for Crippled Children.

I would like to conclude by saying that the success of projects like this depends on what the students make of it. Crossing the time barrier is not an easy thing to do. The sock hop on Saturday night may not have been a genuine greaser dance, but everyone had a good time.

Castenet Clickers Give Stomping Good Performance: OLE

by Rob Lopresti

Last Friday Juniata College had a performance of a kind few students had seen before. The Jose' Greco Company was here giving a program of Spanish dancing.

It's difficult to do a very accurate review of the show because they apparently didn't follow the program, so one couldn't identify most of the pieces. However, one can say that the show was well done.

The dancing was very stylized and full of the heel stomping and castenet clicking that most people think of as Spanish dancing. Beyond this, there was much that was new and creative. The dances were all well choreographed by Greco and Nana Lorca, and they were all given good performances by the company. Nana Lorca's fandango "Garbo de Andalucia" and the high-jumping solo by one of the men were two highlights of the show.

One thing which most of the audience enjoyed, was the costuming. The fancy, brightly colored traditional clothes were really beautiful.

The music was handled by a piano, two guitars and a singer. It seemed good; though especially in the case of the singer, the sound system was really too bad to tell.

If the Huntingdon Concert Association and the Juniata Artist Series is trying to expose people to cultural and entertaining shows, no one can deny they succeeded with Jose' Greco.

Freedom Is Message Of New Lib Unit

by Steve Townsend

For a relatively small institution, Juniata has managed to secure some very exceptional talent through its artists series. Not the least of which was the April 2nd appearance of the Nusic Liberation Art Unit. In a concert that lasted well over two hours, George Taylor's Art Unit weaved its way through six numbers of highly imaginative modern jazz.

The group, originally titled, "New Jazz Ensemble", wisely removed from their name any specific mention to music types, leaving the audience free of traditional stereotypes. Music, as we have grown to know it, is merely a diversion, an entertainment, we had never thought of the possibility that music could in any way be intellectual. Consequently, the Art Unit had attained one of its major goals before ever walking on stage.

The first composition, pianist John Blake's "A Quick Prayer" immediatly threw the listeners to the defensive side. They couldn't sing along without vocals, and they certainly couldn't drift pleasantly down stream on a series of catchly little melodies. They had been confronted. Drummer Emanuel Thompson and Bassist Kenneth Kellan continually shot bursts of rhythmic confusion out over the crowd. George Taylor was ripping through saxophone riffs with phenomenal virauosity, and Blakes piano seemed to dart around the other three providing just enough structure to keep the whole thing on Earth. For most of the gathering this was their first experience at interpreting the music themselves. All meaning, or nonmeaning as the case may be, was

When Is An Individual Justified In Breaking State Law? -- Told

by Patrick E. Fleagle

To what extent is an individual compelled to follow the state's laws? When is an individual justified in breaking these laws? These and other related questions were topics of discussion in the Juniata Symposium "The State and the Limits of Civil Obedience." Dr. Eugene V. Rostow, Professor of Law at Yale Law School; Dr. Richard Taylor, Professor of Philosophy at the University of Rochester; and Ralph B. Potter, Jr., Professor of Social Ethics at Harvard Divinity School were the three prominent symposiasts involved in the discussion sessions.

Various philosophers speak at Symposium in Oller Hall.

Dr. Richard Taylor began the symposium with a lecture based on a chapter from his forthcoming book Freedom, Anarchy, and the Law. According to Dr. Taylor two conditions must be met to give rise to obligation, a relationship to others and rules of this relationship. He emphasized that the participants in a society need not be the originators of the rules that they live by and cited the idea of voluntary acceptance through representative government as a "myth."

Speaking to the question "Under what conditions can one disobey the law?" Dr. Taylor rejected the ideas of disobeying a law because one feels it is unjust or goes against one's conscience. Rather, Taylor felt that the question of civil disobedience must be answered in terms of the practical consequences of breaking the law. He cited three circumstances which justified defiance of the law: 1) when the purpose of the law is defeated by compliance in a certain instance. 2) when the purpose of the law is defeated by compliance in any instance, and 3) when there is a conflict of obligations in which the political obligation is overruled.

In the second night's lecture with the three symposiasts Dr. Eugene Rostow, in opposition to Dr. Taylor's "practical consequences" theory, expounded the Jeffersonian doctrine of a social contract as a basis of social order. According to Rostow, this contract consists of renewed popular consent by such procedures as voting and other political activities. Rostow stressed in a later symposium session that mere participation under the majority principle of government implies consent. Rejecting the claim

Frederick Hand To Be Guest Artist At JC's Chamber Music Series

The 1972-73 Juniata College Chamber Music Series will sponsor its second concert of the season April 16 at 8:15 p.m. in the Ellis Hall Ballroom on the College campus. Guest artist will be classical guitarist Frederick Hand.

The Monday evening concert is sponsored by Juniata College and its Department of Music in cooperation with the Visiting Artists Program.

In conjunction with the concert, the Juniata College Center Board will sponsor a Coffeehouse and Clinic Friday, April 14 at 8 p.m. with Mr. Hand present.

The third event in the busy weekend of activity for the visiting guitarist will be a concert in the Penn Alto Hotel Ballroom in Altoona, Sunday, April 15 at 8:15 p.m. This concert is sponsored by the Blair-Bedford Area Juniata College Alumni Club.

Mr. Hand will perform "popular" guitar pieces and talk about the study of guitar and answer other questions during his coffeehouse concert in Ellis Hall, Saturday night, April 14.

For both his appearances at the Penn Alto Hotel on Sunday, April 15, and in Ellis Hall on April 16, Mr. Hand will be joined by Dr. and Mrs. King of the Music Department, and Charles Redenberger, concertmaster, and Lorraine Fox, principle cellist, of the Altoona Symphony. For his program, the same for both concerts, the guitarist will perform several solos by Milan and Sanz, and will join Dr. King in a sonata by Paganini, a virtuoso work designed to exploit the technical resources of both instruments. The program will also include a concerto for guitar and strings by Vivaldi, which is a rare work of the Baroque for guitar. and a quintet by Boccherini for strings and guitar — perhaps one of the most interesting works for this combination by an 18th century composer.

Mr. Hand has a unique reputation as a master of both popular and classical guitar styles, and should appeal to a large segment of students interested in the guitar.

The public is cordially invited to attend any of these events. Both the concerts on campus, Saturday and Monday, are free. The Penn Alto concert will have an admission price of $1.00 with all high school students admitted as guests of the Blair-Bedford Alumni Club.

UFO's Told of By Friedman

by Ron Mowen

Sunday night in Oller Hall strange happenings were told. . . Stories of glowing disc-shaped objects flying through the sky at staggering speed, soil that glowed after being touched by one of these objects, and best of all little men with fat faces abducting two terror-stricken humans from their car, all echoed through Oller for two hours.

Mr. Stanton Friedman, a strong believer in U.F.O.'s and a nuclear-physicist, lectured on the subject of U.F.O.'s to a large audience during those two hours in Oller Hall. Mr. Friedman has an impressive background of research and work with such companies as G.M. and Westinghouse. He now is

J. C. Offers On–Campus Courses To Prisoners

While many people today admit that it is extremely difficult to find a job, research shows that it is seven times as difficult for a man with a police record. More than half of those released from prison commit another crime and end up right back behind prison walls. However, Juniata College is working to increase employability and post-release adjustments of prisoners by establishing an on-campus full-time educational program for inmates of the Huntingdon Correctional Institution.

Two inmates, picked through academic ability, security clearance, and motivation, receive full-time instructions during the regular class sessions. The on-campus phase of the program was made possible by a continuation of a grant from the Pennsylvania Governor's Justice Commission and the Bureau of Corrections. Beginning last fall Juniata Instructors have offered a number of courses within the prison. The on-campus phase, was a continuation of that program.

The ultimate goal of the program is to reduce the number of prisoners returning to prison after being released. The goal is based on the assumptions that better educated inmates became more employable and have more insight into and control over deviant behavior.

Letter to the Editor

In response to the letter to the editor by David C. Harrison we would like to object to the inclusion of the Freshman Class Play in his description of how crude and disgusting All Class Night was. The writers of the freshman production felt that the way to elicit audience response was to present a take-off on Cabaret using J.C. and a humorous depiction of a certain life-style present here and on virtually every college campus. The theme of All Class Night was comedy and the director's purpose was to make sure that what was presented was done so in good taste, so as not to directly offend anyone. You, Mr. Harrison, we are sincerely sorry for your lacking sense of humor, as we do not consider ours in any way "warped". If the "gross," disgusting presentations along with the "drunks" bothered you, then why did you continue attending All Class Night during your four years here? Also, if the recent night forced upon you your fill of disgust, then why did you sit through the four plays?

If you really are as open-minded about sex and its beauty, then you would not consider the freshman play smutty or a put-down on the beauty of sex.

You stated that last year's sophomore production was good, well we consider this year's freshman production good and not worthy of your generalized statements. Our definition of a good production is one in which fell under the theme title and engrossed the audience in laughter. If you do not feel we freshmen did so and with a degree of respectability then, God have mercy upon you!

Very Sincerely,

Watching "Butch Cassidy and the Sundance Kid" in Oller Hall the other evening, I got the uneasy feeling that something bad was wrong. The movie was made several seasons ago and at the time received much in the way of applause and ballyhoo as well as being just a 'great' movie and real fun and a 'had to see' type of thing. I have a nasty, built-in stubborn streak for resisting anything one 'has to do' and so had, up to this occasion, avoided exposure to camp western.

Sometimes one is just too tired or physically exhausted to enjoy anything, and at first, I excused my negative feelings to this possibility. Then as it continued, I thought maybe it was due to remnants of the '73 flu fever which still plagued the system or perhaps I was more in the mood for something a little more sad, or romantic, or meaningful in the intellectual (sic) sense of that much maligned word.

So I began to chew up the contents beginning with the actors. I like Paul Newman. He's always Paul Newman and always a little less brilliant than he imagines himself to be. He was perfectly cast in "Cat on a Hot Tin Roof" but like so many of the rest of us, he wants to be something other than what he is. Robert Redford is sort of the opposite. He is always the character he is playing but being rather pretty in the face, his characters never have individual depth but a general universality that somehow doesn't stick to the mental bones. Katherine Ross is an early American beauty carved life-size out of Ivory Soap. They all look good. Too good.

At about this time along came that penny cheap dreadful song "Raindrops" and immediately visions of Burt Bachrach smiling that smug, self-satisfied 'ain't I the cat's whiskers' smile which he tooth flashes at you at every opportunity and I zeroed in on my unhappiness. It wasn't even raining in this sham of a movie. The whole thing was not even a great put-on (such as 'Beat The Devil') and, as such, fell apart at the seams once the

Two short years ago, Juniata took on the challenge of progressive education. The New Curriculum was established, and lo and behold, its spirit pervaded the campus. With this bright light shining down on us, we were able to make changes in the name of the spirit of the New Curriculum. Sometimes, however, one has to wonder if somebody turned out the light.

The situation was again brought to light (no pun intended) when it was discovered that the Dean's list is being eliminated here at Juniata. When inquiring as to the logic of this move, one is told that the Dean's list is not in the spirit of the New Curriculum, and left with that strange feeling that always occurs right after you ask a stupid question.

And, if someone, not wishing to appear ill-informed, pushes for further explanation, he discovers that the real reason is that the idea of grades does not coincide with the spirit of the New Curriculum.

Despite this explanation, however, the pieces do not immediately fall into place. One has to wonder if this is the same spirit that called for the elimination of pass-fail courses and the making of a "C" as the cutoff grade for passing. Is this mystical spirit a little inconsistent, or are we just unenlightened.

It seems to me, that the elimination of the Dean's list would be a solid step towards the de-emphasizing of grades, if other steps were taken. However, there is little evidence of those other steps. And further, there is a question of whether, given the present state of society, the de-emphasis of grades is really a practical move. I think everyone would agree that ideally, grades should be eliminated. However, most also recognize the importance placed on grades by graduate schools and employers. There is also the question of exactly what to replace them with.

So, I see two points that are evident in this little story. One is that we must consider the question of whether we ought to recognize Juniata students for excellence in academics. The second is that we better find out exactly what this spirit of the New Curriculum is, and what changes it can actually justify.

DISCussion

by Rick Boyer

Rock music has undergone drastic changes in the past year and a half or so. The real innovative music today is being released by people like Captain Beefheart and Dr. John and groups like Pink Floyd, who are relative newcomers to the rock scene. With few exceptions, old bands, who reached their peak in popularity and artistic importance during the rock boom of the 1960's seem to be having a hard time sustaining themselves and coming up with any new and exciting music.

Jefferson Airplane typifies this situation probably better than any other example. Their new album, "Thirty Seconds Over Winterland", shows the group stuck in a rut, unable to create music even at par with their former excellence. The Airplane was once the best rock band this country could offer. If you don't believe me, listen to any or all of their albums released from "Surrealistic Pillow" to "Volunteers", and you'll see what I mean.

The departure of Spencer Dryden, in early 1970, and Marty Balin, a year later, really hurt the group. Dryden, who was a jazz musician in his pre-Airplane days, was (and probably still is) an excellent drummer, forming a solid rhythm for the rest of the band to build on. Marty Balin, one time leader and originator of the group (in 1965), was (is) not only a fine singer, but he largely checked the overt social-political pretentiousness of Grace Slick and Paul Kantner.

Today, the Airplane is really two bands: the Hot Tuna extension, with Jorma Kaukonen, Jack Casady, and Papa John Creach; and the Slick-Kantner team who write most of the group's material. Add David Freiberg doing vocals and John Barbata on drums, and you have all the personnel under the title Jefferson Airplane. As can be expected, that title is in name only. The members of the Airplane perform individually so often, that when they get together, musically, they don't.

The new release, recorded live in Chicago and San Francisco during their cross country tour last summer, sounds dull and leaden, especially on side two. Everyone seems to get in the way of everyone else.

Opening the album is "Have You Seen the Saucers?", that old single that never went anywhere. Interestingly, this track turns out to be the best one on the album. It's nicely done, still containing that apocalyptic mood and the fine Kaukonen lead guitar of the studio version.

Next, we are confronted with "Feel So Good", originally off the album "Bark". Although a fine song, this version is dragged out to the unbelievable length of eleven minutes. Why the Airplane chose this track I'll never know. Filling up most of side one, "Feel So Good" could have been replaced by a few good short cuts that I'm sure they had on tape (How 'bout those tracks that include Marty Balin when he temporarily joined his old friends for the Winterland concert).

The inclusion of "Crown of Creation" kind of surprised me. It really doesn't justify itself. The vocal harmonies are very sloppy and Grace Slick's spoken bit of wit and sarcasm in the middle of the song just ruins it totally.

Side two is the real letdown. "When the Earth Moves Again" is as dull and plodding as the studio version on "Bark". "Milk Train" is all Grace Slick rasping and wailing about milk delivery or something. Her voice these days is particularly strained, probably due to her many throat nose complications. Whereas she once had a voice as pretty as Joni Mitchell's, Grace now comes off more as a bad Cass Elliot. "Trial By Fire" and "Twilight Double Leader", the remaining two songs, aren't any better or worse (thank God!) than those versions on "Long John Silver".

Although Jefferson Airplane fails musically, they sure have maintained their sense of humor. Who else would have an album jacket depicting flying toasters (toasters?) and a record label called Grunt Records.

All in all, a bad album by a group with a lot of talent. Maybe I'm expecting too much, but Grace and the guys proved long ago they were (are) capable of producing a good album. We haven't seen one of those in quite a while.

A Judge Tells Why ACN Judging Went As It Did

by D. Bruce Davis

This long after the event there may not be anyone very interested in the All Class Night results, but at the time there seemed to be a lot of people not only very interested but very upset as well, and so to mollify some of them and to assure the return of my youngest daughter unharmed I have promised to try to provide some sort of explanation for why the judging went as it did.

Actually there was remarkably little difference of opinion among the judges. We had been placed in different parts of the house and had made our decisions before convening under the stage, but the rankings and the rationales varied only in miniscule ways. It was a pretty knowledgeable panel too, I think; the four members (two alumni and three faculty) having something like a combined total of 33 All Class Nights behind them. The comments which follow display my own particular biases and tastes, but I think the other judges would support me on most of them.

For convenience' sake, let me take the classes in order.

THE FRESHMEN. The essence of drama is conflict, but the central agon that Saturday night was not between two characters in any skit but between the actors and that great, drunken bellowing mob that made up the audience. The crowd this year had slipped over the line from the amiable rowdiness that normally characterizes it and had become one of thise B-movie blob creatures, enveloping and suffocating the actors and pumping itself up with its own feeble attempts at wit. It wasn't just a tough audience, it was an impossible audience, more interested in its own onanistic pleasures than in having a nice honest relationship with those people up on the proscenium.

The freshmen bore the brunt of our boorishness. At the very least the 1973 inscription on the cup should include an asterisk pointing out that only three classes were permitted a fair shot at the title that year.

Freshmen are always at a disadvantage in the competition anyway, not because they don't know what is expected (which could be an advantage) but because they do not know each other well enough yet. They don't know who might be able to exert the kind of control necessary to pull off even as modest an enterprise as a skit, and they don't know who their best performers are. When the call goes out for ideas they invariably have to put up with eight or ten people who want to redo a nifty little skit that laid em in the aisles back at Moshannon High, and the whole thing is lucky to make it to the stage at all.

This year's freshmen, though, finished only a whisker out of second place, and on my card I had them in that position. Not that there weren't problems. The class had decided to get around the question of whom to entrust the acting to by simply putting the entire class on stage, so the skit was made up almost wholly of production numbers. The links between these were limply written and half-heartedly played.

The "Cabaret" parody was an idea with possibilities, though. Not only did it provide a coherence that two of the later skits badly lacked, but also the motif of the innocent's induction into decadence translated very nicely. Since the unannounced theme for most of the evening turned out to be Great Gawd Jus Look How WICKED We Are, those people who had seen "Cabaret" were afforded an unplanned set of ironies to smile at during the evening.

The objections launched most often at the freshmen in the postmortems had to do with their putting on a musical instead of a comedy. I will grant that I didn't hear a lot of comedy, but then I couldn't hear anything most of the time, and the few scraps of lyric I could make out seemed fairly clever. Something else: there was one tiny moment, when Mr. Sirianni and company were on stage, when writing, delivery, movement, enthusiasm, polish and discipline all coalesced with a flash and a rush into entertainment. It was a beautiful moment, but it was not to be reached again for the rest of the night.

THE SOPHOMORES. The sophomore skit lacked writing, pacing, acting, wit and most other admirable qualities. The performers favored a style of acting that makes lavish use of leering and eye-rolling. If they had thought of it, they probably would have sent classmates out into the audience to elbow us after each hot one. Possibly the worst ACN skit since the Junior Class dramatized "Patient Griselda" in 1928.

THE JUNIORS. Most of the people who questioned the judging thought the juniors should have wrapped it up with their crowd-pleasing pill-popping finale, and in fact this skit did win in the "audience response" category on all four scoresheets. The finish was pretty funny, and there had been funny bits here and there earlier too, but there had also been some long dry spots.

The spermatozoa, for example, had not only been shamelessly lifted from Woody Allen's movie, but they were out on stage a long time and nobody had thought up much of anything for them to do. The pantomiming of old rock records didn't work as well this year, partly because they were using almost an entire record to make one small, dumb joke, and partly because they just hadn't worked hard enough on the presentation. (I still remember with immense fondness those girls last year clutching their zipper notebooks and doing an exquisitely accurate parody of the Shangri-Las.)

The argument I ran into most often in favor of the juniors (at an intimate little gathering held after the performances) was that the crowd had responded most vociferously to them, so they should have won. I confess that I'm wary of such reasoning, for reasons that shade off into snobbery, but I will concede that my view of ACN is that the skits ought to be able to bear up under at least a few of the traditional standards of dramatic excellence. If, on the other hand, we can agree that crowd response is all, then hell yes, I say scrap the judges, buy a noisemeter, and hand the cup to the class that makes the needle jump the highest. Then we wouldn't have to bother with these skits at all: a class that didn't feel like putting a lot of time into planning the thing could just send somebody out on stage and have him rape a chicken. I guarantee they'd do no worse than second.

THE SENIORS. On a good year the seniors could have been beaten without a whole lot of trouble, but they were far and away the class of this lot. They used the stage better, they attempted (and pulled off nicely) impersonations, and they were even willing to risk subtlety. By that I mean there were lines and bits that weren't underlined. If the audience noticed them, ok, and if not there were usually plenty of other things to find. My compliments to the lady on the dice wheel.

Two other aspects of the senior presentation seemed stronger than any of the earlier offerings. First, they showed an encouraging awareness that a world exists outside this campus. Second, they showed an ability to skewer absurdities with a fair degree of deftness. It isn't easy to parody the studio audience of Let's Make a Deal, because that audience is already a grotesque parody of studio audiences in general. And when, later, a contestant on The Mating Game obeys the request for a description of a co-panelist with the line, "He's a chink," he's not simply indulging in a fashionable Bunkerism, he is succinctly indicting the whole hypocritical, gooey-sweet atmosphere that pervades and permits that program.

Let me finish by indulging in a few observations on the evening in general. There was a widespread assumption afterwards that various skits were penalized for what invariably gets referred to as "grossness." Not so. You would go far before you found a threesome as lecherous, scatological, and generally prone to sin as my fellow judges. I myself told a risque story once. But dammit it isn't enough to be simply dirty; you've got to put some style, some indirection, some cleverness into it; you have to put some kind of English on it so that it surprises the audience. With some thought, you can do that all night. You can only startle them once or twice.

I don't mean to come on like Pentheus at the Dionysian revels, but even a revel can be made more entertaining if it has at least a little style and polish.

Why should faculty members get so upset at what is admittedly a trivial event? We do get upset to a surprising degree; even those who stay away bemoan what goes on at All Class Night. And not, lord knows, because it's so dirty. It's really pretty safe and pretty tame even where language is concerned, and as far as spectacle, no has ever so much as flashed a mam or flexed a moon.

No, it's more the provinciality of the recent ACNs that sets us to weeping in our bourbon. There was a time when students took all humanity for their province, and you have to admit that that gives you more scope for humor than our few overworked pieces of sexual equipment. There are lots of things outside, things more important than quiz shows even, that deserve at least occasionally to see the backs of your hands. What the faculty is looking so gloomy about has partly to do with guilt at not making students aware of what more could be done with the format available.

There was not, to mention just one omission, so much as a single allusion to national or world politics in the entire 1973 edition of All Class Night. Is it because students think politics are too serious for satire? That upsets me. Or is it that for political jokes to work you have to be able to count on a little sophistication?—and you don't think an audience made up largely of Juniata College students has that sophistication? Are you beginning to see why faculty members are so upset?

Opening the evening with "Cabaret" was painfully appropriate. The evening produced a whole campus full of Sally Bowles's—preening and winking and flashing their kelly green nails all over the place, and all the time so myopically, deliciously intent on their own tawdry little libertinisms that they didn't even notice the big-league evils outside the club.

If we can't do better than this next year I say let's just pack it in.

of civil disobedients of conscience Rostow emphasized that the only valid ground for civil disobedience is a breach of the social compact.

Dr. Potter, in his analysis, felt that the act of civil disobedience cannot be justified by a simple formula. Rather, he feels that we must seek the more basic questions of life and "have a program for one's own being to describe different lines of action." Speaking of the "Prophetic Vocation", Dr. Potter felt that these "prophets" were responsible for consciousness raising. Even though Potter thought these prophets were justified in their civil disobedience, he stressed that civil disobedience was more a "calling" than a right. In a later symposium session Potter also maintained that these prophets do not have a claim to exemption from the same obligations as others.

The three day symposium ended with a wrap-up session in which each of the three symposiasts reiterated their positions and related them to to specific questions from the audience. The symposium was sponsered by the S&H Foundation Lectureship program, The Council for Philosophical Studies, and The Juniata College Philosophy Department.

Softball, Tennis, Badminton and Team Handball Underway As Spring Intramurals Burst Forth

by Vernne Wetzel

Despite some wet and chilly weather last week, softball and tennis IM tournaments got off to a good start. Badminton just started this past Monday, and team handball has been underway for a few weeks, so the playing schedules are pretty well rounded out now.

In team handball, six games were played last week. On Monday, the game's score was Moosers 33 — Roadrunners 16. On Tuesday, Winners III beat Abadie 28-17, and Arch Men nipped No Names 18-17. Moosers beat Close Windows 27-24 on Wednesday, and on Thursday the Arch Men handled the Roadrunners by 27-20, and Winners III defeated No Name by 33-18. The team standings at the end of the week were

Moosers	5	1
Close Windows	2	3
Abadie	2	3
Arch Men	2	3
No Names	2	4
Roadrunners	1	5

Softball got underway on Monday, but all games scheduled for Wednesday were cancelled due to rain. In the women's league two games were played on the opening day: Howdidodats 10 — Coder's Clodders 3 and Spacers 13 — Terry's Terrible Teddy Bears 3. On Tuesday, it was Spring Terrors 15 — 3S. S. 14; Debbie Fenamore and Debbie Smith led the Terrors with 4 hits each, and Nancy Mowry led 3S.S. with 4 hits. The Abecedarians beat the J.A.'s by 11-2; Lynn Apple led the Abecedarians with 3 hits, and Pat Lovett, Lynne Nenstiel and Pat Adams led the J.A.'s with 2 hits each. On Thursday the Spring Terrors shut out the J. A.'s 17-0; Ellen Humphries led the Terrors with 4 hits and a homer, and Jo Taylor led the J.A.'s with 2 hits. The Abecedarians romped over the Spacers by 12-2; Mary Ann Repman, Cathy Dickey and Noreen O'Connel led Abecedarians with 3 hits each, and Betsy Schuss and Cathy Dickey each had home runs. For the Spacers, Packy Cronyn and Lauri Reeder were the leading hitters with 2 each.

In flight one of the men's softball league there were six games on Monday last week. The scores of those games were Mainliners 9 — Greased Lightning 5, North Umqua River 19 — Thunder Alley Kats 9, King's Men 15 — Country Joel & the Fish 5, Bear & His Court 10 — Longshots 2, Vice Squad 13 — Master Batters 3, and Henchmen 19 — Coyotes II 6.

Flight two of the men's softball league saw action on Tuesday and Thursday last week. Ant Hill Mob won over Northwest Passage 13-3; Rick Fields and Paul Donahue led the Mob with 3 hits each, and Paul had 2 homers. Matt Musho and Steve Kimmel led N.W. Passage with 2 hits each, and Rod Cook had a homer for them. N.J. House beat Stan & Pete's by 11-2; Gill Landis led N.J. House with one home run. Cisco's Kids pounded Reaches 19-2; Steve Gretz led the Kids with 3 hits, and five other Kids had homers (John Graybill, Frank Wiley, Tom Knepper, Don Martin, and Mark Salisbury). For the Roaches, Greg Eveline, Jack Conlon, Ted Rhoads, Alice Boomhower, and Bill Siebert each had one hit, and Donnie Williams and Bill Siebert had one homer each. The Raggers beat the Faculty 8-2; Mark Brown, John Casp, and Gary Gillen each had 2 hits to lead Raggers, and R. Hunter, D. Wampler, J. Cauffman, and W. Alexander led Faculty with 1 hit each. The Bucs took Winners IV by 9-3; for the Bucs, Kent La Forme, Dave Bechtel, Jack Rowell, and John Woolley led with 3 hits each, and Kent had 2 homers. Terry Engdall led the Winners with 3 hits.

On Thursday, Ant Hill Mob beat the Bucs 7-3; for the Mob, Gary Ober, Paul Donahue, Gary Shope and Charlie Hoover led with 2 hits each, and Steve Peoples led the Bucs with 2 hits. Cisco's Kids took the Faculty by 11-5; Steve Gretz and Bob Barth led the Kids with 3 hits each, and for Faculty, John Cauffman, Dick Kimmey, R. Hunter, D. left entirely to the translation facilities of individual imaginations. One could find himself in the tropics engulfed in struggle, adventure, and pain, or be a lover in the grand fashion of any Shakespeare charactor. The music was free to wander as far ones mind would allow it.

Over two hours later the Art Unit walked off stage to a very warm response. "Inside the Goddess Of Tomorrow", which closed the set, almost reassured us that the confusion caused by numbers such as, "For Adults Only", "Jungle Song" and "For The Sake Of Sanity" was only a temporary case of dissonace. For many the tedious job of resolution was just beginning as the exits swung open. The statement made on page two of the program was fast becoming a reality; ". . . for it is through our music that we strive to free ourselves and those who hear us". Juniata was indeed fortunate to have had the artistry of The Nu (sic) Liberation Art Unit.

life force of the moment passed. It had no depth dimension based on the truth of reality as was evidenced in 'Bonnie and Clyde' but was being played for quick laughs and an easy buck.

Even the dialogue such as "Who are those guys?", "it's the specialty of the house and it's still moving", and "why don't you tell it to her straight?" does not undo the unfortunate damage that the underlying structure of immorality premised by the attitude of this popular movie.

What we laugh at and with, we condone.

This cavalier approach to making thievery glamorous and devilishly attractive with even the last stand death scene played with a smile on the face and a smart crack on the lips is not new to us. We have always made the ugly pretty in our American drive to wash away dirt in our societal linen. But in the back recesses of our minds there was always an unfathomable fear of a God of Great Wrath who would some day call our deeds and ourselves to account.

Today we have somehow loosened ourselves from this mentally constricting discipline and with movies like 'Butch Cassidy" and its heroes, how can we validate the old virtues, much less teach them?

Baseball Season Comes Up Fast And Furious

by Adam Leiden

Well baseball fans this is going to be your season if you love seeing a lot of offensive prowess. That is of course, if our Indians can keep those sticks swinging. All but one player is back from last year's fine squad. Coach Berrier told me in a private interview that, 'the boys are hitting the ball the best I've seen in years."

Defensively the club is sound and no problems are anticipated. Pitching seems to be the weakest seam. The pitchers are back from last year's club and the word is that if they can keep clear of arm trouble it's going to be a long season—for the opposing teams, that is.

Our first exhibition game was a successful debut. We beat the big boys from our neighboring school in State College. Let's all get out there and cheer the boys on to chuck BB's hand.

spending much of his time investigating reports of U.F.O.'s and lecturing on the subject.

Mr. Friedman began his lecture by stating that there are three categories which sightings of these objects are listed: 1) Reports by reliable eyewitnesses in which enough information is given to identify the object sighted (it's a bird, it's a plane, no it's swamp gas), 2) Reports in which not enough information is collected to identify the object sighted, 3) Reports with enough information but the object sighted can not be identified, even by competant investigators;U.F.O.'s. He also stated that these objects are definitely manufactured but not on earth. They are not manufactured on earth because we(earthlings) do not have the ability to manufacture a craft that behaves the way these glowing disc-shaped objects behave. These U.F.O.'s hover, move both horizontally and vertically at great speeds and make no noise or expel any exhaust.

Mr. Friedman had no kind words for the U.S. Air Force who has the chore of investigating reports of U.F.O.'s. He stated that the U.S.A.F. is very evasive and secretive with its investigations and that the facts in its investigations very seldom are heard by the public.

Slides were shown of flying saucers buzzing right through the clear blue, and a question and answer period followed the lecture.

One bit of information: Those of you with a story and a bit of evidence concerning U.F.O.'s can win a cash prize. National Inquire is offering a cash prize for the best TRUE U.F.O story. The people with fat faces have it so far.

Bach's Uncle Is Last Of Artist Series for This Year

Tomorrow, May 3, the last of this year's Artists Series takes place. Bach's Uncle, an outstanding group consisting of four musicians, all highly talented, will perform this final show. Bach's Uncle is a cellist who played with Music from Marlboro, an oboist who recorded with Joan Baez, a flutist who performs with the Philadelphia Composer's Forum, and a harpsichordist from the New York Pro Musica. The four musicians, Jerry Grossman, Marsha Heller, Sue Kohn and Edward Smith feel comfortable with themselves and with the varied styles of music they perform.

Jerry Grossman, from Cambridge, Mass., studied in Boston and at the Curtis Institute. He then became a member of the Aeolian Chamber Players, and toured with Music from Marlboro last fall. Marsha Heller from Cleveland graduated from the Obertin Conservatory. She recorded with Joan Baez and played English Horn with the American Symphony Orchestra.

Sue Kohn, a native from Philadelphia, studied flute with William Kincaid. She is a member of the Philadelphia Composers Forum and appeared with the Anna Sokolow Dance Company. Edward Smith graduated from Laurence College. He studied on a Fulbright Scholarship in Italy and studied the harpsichord at Yale. After teaching at the University of Illinois, he joined the New York Pro Musica and appeared all over the world.

Lecture Given On Eckankar May 2nd

by Rob Lopresti

There will be a lecture and discussion on Eckankar in the Ellis Hall ballroom, May 2nd ,at 8 p.m.

The teachers of Eckankar say it " is not a yoga, religion, philisophy, metaphysical system or an occult science". They call it the "Ancient Science of Soul Travel".

Eckankar believes a person needn't die to find a higher plane of existance. He can achieve it while alive, by the parctice of "Soul Travel".

They explain soul travel as a person transferring his attention from the material world to the true ones beyond.

The ancient ideas of Eckankar were brought to light in the twentieth century by Paul Twitchell and Darwin Cross (the living Eckankar master).

The lecture will be free and is open to all those interested.

Green Grass Folk Festival Includes Concerts Dances And Workshops

by Rick Boyer

The Green Grass Folk Festival, lasting from Saturday, 8 A.M., until Sunday midnight, provided a unique experience for Juniata Students. Dubbed "the smallest folk festival in existence in America today," Green Grass presented a staggering variety of music within the folk context itself (If you can believe that possible.): from Yugoslav traditional to Mississippi Delta blues. A wide variety indeed.

Billy Vanaven opened the Saturday night concert. After soloing on a few fine ballads he was joined by his girl friend and singer. Her addition greatly expanded his performance. The set was highlighted by his (and her) last two numbers, the first featuring some nice country crooning by the girl and the second about a local call girl that somehow strikes a familiar image in everyone's mind. On Sunday, Billy presented an unusual set. Interaction between audience and performer was enhanced by such numbers as "Chicken" and "Graveyard". Juniata student Saroo Ambarchian helped on percussion for a Georgian (Russia that is) traditional hymn, Billy's Girl added vocals for a beautiful rendition of Bill Monroe's "Sailor Boy," while humor prevailed with "Barnyard Dance," a song personifying vegetables.

In a way, John Jackson and Elizabeth Cotton complimented each other nicely. Both are deeply submerged in the rather forgotten rural Southern culture. Their peformances not only showed it, but emphasized it. John culled up some old blues classics by Mississippi John Hurt, Blind Boy Fuller, Blind Man Blake, and Jessie Reed and performed them in their traditional vein; a relief from hearing the over-hyped versions by today's rock groups, who so often change traditional song's arrangement so as to lose its emotive quality. Thus, John's rendering of "Key to the Highway" was completely different grunted, groaned, and spoke to his guitar saying, "Come on, play dat thing!" or "Goin' to Kansas City, boy. Yea!" Further enriching his performance.

Dave Andrews Speaks On Hopes For Student Govt.

To the Student Body of Juniata College:

As I leave office to complete my term, I would like to mention a few areas in which I think we students should divert our energy next year. Rather than dwell upon past objectives, I will note some possible considerations for next year's student priorities; as I have perceived them from my one year of experience.

First, I would urge that students use the opportunities to get involved under this year's newly ratified constitution. A dormitory government with greater power has been created, and students can get their complaints heard through this body if they so desire.

Secondly, we must continue to involve ourselves in the affairs of the "outside" world. My administration sponsored such things as the Colloquy program, voter registration drives, and sex lectures to make us aware of the world around us. We also took stands on national issues, such as abortion and Vietnam. We students can no longer afford to be "academic hermits," and deny the existence of a world outside of Huntingdon. The policies (e.g., financial aid policies, student sub-minimum wage of Nixon administration) affect all of us and they cannot be ignored.

Next year we must demand a better health service from the administration. Our health service survey proved it is a disgrace; now we must use these facts to get change. Likewise, we must keep demanding that the food service give us adequate service. We did change the janitorial service somewhat this year, but no one will hesitate to say that the "Green Army" still needs improvement. After a year of negotiating, the administration has conceded the existence of intercampus phones within the next couple of years. We must urge them next year to fulfill this goal.

Furthermore, this year's Student Senate has become more involved in the faculty's policies. We must strive next year to make the faculty accountable for decisions that affect us. Many faculty members don't believe that we should know what policies they vote upon. But if this is so, what is our $3400 paying for —a faculty-directed college? By participation in faculty committees and just by talking to faculty members about their voting on student- related issues, we can move in the right direction.

In conclusion, I would hope that together we work further next year to make the students voice heard on this campus. I thank you for your cooperation and interest this year. I just hope that next year all of us will "keep pushing!"

Sincerely,
David P. Andrews

Come See Juniata's Annual Spring Carnival May 3rd-5th

by Dave MacVeigh

The annual Spring Carnival, planned for this weekend, includes several major events, says Bruce W. Bader.

The first major event is the election of two attendants from each class on Thursday, May 3. On Friday morning at the May Breakfast, which is for girls only — served by guys — the name of the May Queen will be announced as well as that of Prince Charming.

Beginning about 6:00 P.M. Friday evening, the carnival itself will get underway with both children's and adults' rides, as well as approximately 20 booths sponsored by various campus and community organizations.

At 8 o'clock Friday, there will be an outdoor dance which will go on as long as there are people to keep it going. Both the carnival and the dance are to be on the parking lot around Cloister and the gym.

The carnival will begin again about noon Saturday. That night, Oller Hall will be the scene of an 80-minute one-act play entitled The Cage. Written by a convict at San Quentin, The Cage is performed by professional actors who are all ex-cons. Following their performance, the actors will have a question-and-answer session with the audience. The play has received wide acclaim and is to be performed in Europe this fall. It has been on more than 400 college campuses.

Mr. Bader notes that the Raft Regatta will be on May 19.

Do you have a medicine ball in your room? "What's a medicine ball?" A medicine ball is one of several props Totem Theater needs for its production of The Star-Spangled Girl. We need things like: a medicine ball, a ukulele, a feather duster, a women's flight bag, a pair of handcuffs with a key, and a marijuana plant. If you have any of these things, and would be willing to lend them to us for a week, contact Dr. Crouch in G-305, or Ken Shelly, box 1148, or room 305 Terrace. And even if you don't have any of these things, come and see the play, May 10, 11, and 12.

Jose' Greco

Sir,

On April 6, 1973 Jose Greco and his dance company performed to a small but enthused audience at Juniata College; the concert was reviewed in an attitude of studied indifference in the April 11 Juniatian. I believe as do many of the other three or four hundred people present, that the concert should have been discussed with superlatives. My companions and I were certain we would hear all weekend the sharp tapping of feet in imitation of the dancers. We didn't.

As Rob Lopresti indicates in his review "If the Huntingdon Concert Association and the Juniata Artist Series is trying to expose people to cultural and entertaining shows, ... they succeeded with Jose Greco. At one time a primary reason young people went to college was to "get cultured". Even today you can lead a horse to water but can't make him drink.

Reprehensibly,

All Class Night

Dear friends,

Sometimes you little people down there really worry me. With few enough legal and (relatively) sane means of entertainment on this campus, it seems that we're to lose All Class Night as well. I'm certainly willing to admit that it isn't any sort of great theatrical experience (and I don't think that the excuse of "Well, we're not professionals, what can you expect?" is at all valid; I know damn well that we can be of professional quality, and I think that the judges are quite justified in expecting to see it) but when the arguments begin drooling down into "Oh my God, save us from this evil which we have unleashed!", and "It's so bad that I don't think I could look at another one next year, so kill it now." I begin to make funny noises, break things, and then hunt up a typewriter to vent my wrath upon.

One thing which I have heard and said very often is "Don't just say how bad it is, say what's wrong with it. Then fix it." I've been here three years, and the increase in "audience participation" and the efforts of the class plays to satiate the Blob (as Mr. Davis so aptly put it) have been really staggering. This year I was sitting in the front row, and I heard — with luck — one word in ten (after the freshman play — I didn't hear any of that, and I regret it).

I was involved in writing and staging the freshman class play in my own first year, and, in an effort to do the best, my colleagues and I went forth into the wilderness of the upper classes to find out just what was expected of us. Not much. Pandering to the personal fetishes of the judges seemed to be rather unethical, and the most often found opinion was that the function of an ACN production was to make everyone laugh and enjoy their drunkenness. Also, it was deemed very impressive to have a large cast, wild costumes, and other signs that our whole class was behind us, so we tried our best. We worried more about whether our costumes, elevator, bar, etc. would be done on time than about rehearsals and general theatrical technique. As it happened, none of the dozen-or-so rehearsals were fully attended; there were too many people and not enough time to work with anyone in particular, and our first full dress rehearsal with props was the night we swaggered out in front of the audience. Over half of the actors had never been on stage before. Despite all this, and the tales we had heard of what was acceptable, we were trying to pull off a moderately dramatic play, with a shock ending. We failed dismally, of course, largely because of our execution, but also because the audience wanted nothing to do with anything serious — this was their night to howl; they had enough to worry about in classes.

But instead of moaning about it, point. Problems: 1) Time — only I prefer to take the academic view- a few weeks are allowed from the announcement of the year's theme; 2) Inexperience — All Class night is one of the very few chances for acting experience and almost the only one for student writing and production; 3) The expectations af the "audience", and more import-

by Edward Kinchley Evans

If there has been a restlessness in your heart and nudging persistence in your mind to become a world famous personality and admired for your talents, it would have benefited you to have gone to the recent concert at Oller Hall featuring Jose Greco. In the words of that song sung by Miss Peggy Lee, "Is that all there is, my friend?"

Within a two hour span of time that evening, we were given a dreary tabloid of such a desire fulfilled. Every element of Fame and its debris in ruin was on the stage in all its tawdry gaudiness. To cover, or at least mascara over, that Time has slowed unmercifully to a peasantly minuet the aging Faun, Mr. Greco has invested more and more of his interest in a vast wardrobe of cheap costumes which cover in period every time slot in history and nationality except perhaps Egypt of the Ptolemies. It's as if he has haunted the auction sales of the world's theatres buying a pretty piece here and a 'little worn' vestment there. In his little company there must have been twelve or fourteen people and each changed clothes at least ten times during the performance.

For a dance program, there was not much dancing. I know very little about the form having teethed watching an old codger named Escudero who is famed for having given yearly a farewell performance but who danced at seventy years of age with an intensity and vitality that made you forget everything but the diamond brilliance of a dance which is in truth a Cock Fight to the death.

In Jose Greco's company there was a young man who had this quality and a middle-aged juan who accompanied him and a beautiful, brown-haired girl who completed the trio for one eye delighting number. The program was so mixed up I never did figure out who was who, but that is not important, at least not to me. The stage was Spain for a few brief minutes then returned to Huntingdon for the rest of the program.

For a world-famous dancer, even long in the tooth, to be reduced to draggling an untalented assortment of refugees from defunct ballet troupes to one night stands in a half-filled auditorium, even if that auditorium is in an Eden-like setting such as Juniata, says more about the vanity of man and the rewards of Fame than a dozen books on the subject.

This does not mean that I think you should not reach for the Stars in your life's search for purpose. It does mean that befoe you reach, know who you are and what you want out of life. Then, when you have achieved this, know to retire and not suffer the disgrace of being a 'buried alive' sideshow.

EDITORIAL

Going to a college in Huntingdon, Pennsylvania does not always put the student who wants to know whats going on in the world in the most strategic position. So, from time to time, I take it upon myself to inform everyone of exactly whats happening.

As it happens, there are a few things to report which may be of interest to students here. First is the current argument in Congress over the minimum wage for students. Anyone who has to work to help themselves through here, might be interested in this one. As it stands now, the Administration has proposed a bill to raise the minimum wage to $2.30 over a three year period. However, before you get excited at the prospect of counting that extra money, make notice of the fact that the bill contains a youth differential. What this means is that students, or anyone who is 18 or 19, would only have a minimum wage of $1.60 or 85% of the minimum wage for everybody else, which ever is higher. Fortunatly, there is also a bill in the House introduced by Rep. John Dent (D-Pa.) which is being supported by most Democrats in Congress. Stay tuned for further details as they become available.

For those who are interested in the Equal Rights Amendment, the count now stands at thirty states having ratified it, fourteen rejecting it, and six states who have not voted on it. The outlook is very dim for ratification in the near future. Alabama, Ohio, South Carolina, Louisianna, Florida and Missouri, the six that have not voted, all seem to be leaning the other way, and at least two states will have to reverse their earlier decisions before ratification is possible.

Last, but not least, I'll mention the financial aid situation, which has crept into the minds of a number of students. The bills came out of committees in April, and reports indicate that Congress will at least increase the President's figures, even if they don't salvage all the programs. I would advise that students keep an eye on developments here, because if the Congress allows the President to cut out all but the BOG's, the most any student could get would be $1400 per year. With Juniata's tuition on the rise, that could have serious implications.

So there you have a brief news roundup. There not easy to get, but you may regret it, if you didn't get them.

Hirsch Directing Choral Workshop June 10 thru 16

Professor Bruce A. Hirsch, chairman of the department of music at Juniata, will be directing a Choral Workshop sponsored by Juniata College. The workshop, June 10-16, is for high school age students who are interested in learning more about vocal and choral arts.

The workshop will include classes in voice production, choral techniques, solo literature and interpretation. Also, a conducting class, music theory, techniques of singing great choral music, and ensemble classes will be included.

Workshop students will have a full schedule of classes each day including rehearsals and activities. To conclude the week's work, the entire workshop group will present a public performance of the choral music studied.

Young men and women from the upper three grades of high school may apply. Application forms which include details on fees and registration requirements are available by contacting Professor Hirsch.

Flutist to Play For Baroque

Miss Eleanor Lawrence, flutist, will present three concerts on the Juniata College campus May 4-6 as part of the Juniata College 1972-73 Chamber Music Series.

Featured as the special guest artist, Miss Lawrence will present two concerts Friday and one Sunday evening. Friday at 9 a.m., she will give a lecture concert on Baroque music for classes in Human Existence and Friday evening at 8 p.m. she will perform an all Baroque concert for classes in Human Existence. Sunday's 8:15 p.m. performance will conclude her appearances. The public is invited as guests of the college to the evening performances, both to be held in Ellis Hall.

A member of the famed New York Metropolitan Opera Orchestra, Miss Lawrence is also a member of the faculty of the Manhattan School of Music and has performed on numerous occasions as soloist in New York and elsewhere. Her father is Dr. John C. Baker, chairman of the Juniata College Board of Trustees.

Davis Criticized For Poetry Talk

by J. G. McDonald '74

"Kvasir, Mr. McKuen and the Demise of Modren Poetry": Scholarly Lecture of Theatrical Bullshit?

The above quote was the title of what was supposed to be a scholarly lecture by D. Bruce Davis, assistant professor of English at J.C. What we were exposed to, last Thursday evening, could, however, be more accurately characterized as an ill prepared cheap shot at contemporary poetry. I deem his show theatrical Bullshit because it's as polite a description as is printable.

For those of you who were not in attendance Thursday, there are three important things to bear in mind. Davis said nothing of substance concerning "Kvasir," our literary magazine, except a poorly concealed inference that it's contents would not compete with, say, an Elliot or a Frost. Davis said nothing about McKuen's pseudo-poetry except to assert that McKuen and "the rock lyricists like the Beatles" filled the void created by low life contemporary poets. Finally, this is a critical point, the phrase, "the demise of modern poetry," equals the poor quality of contemporary poetry in Davis' confusing use of the English language.

This last assertion deserves some attention. Davis bemoaned the lack of musical quality in contemporary poetry. He misses metrical patterns, rhyme, alliteration etc. One must admit that there is a wide strain in the body of current poetry to which this criticism is applicable. But does Davis support this contention with examples? Does he trace this problem, this decline? NO! Instead he reads an excellant poem by Ezra Pound and juxtaposes to it an arbitarily selected poem from the New Yorker. Did I say arbitrary? I am wrong, friends, I'm so very wrong. The poem was most certainly chosen because it was so bad. And the reading! John Wayne couldn't have butchered it more expertly. Davis mumbled; he paused scornfully; and then for the coup de gras, he posed, a fine sneering profile with cute moustach thrust forward, and slowly he crumpled the poem and cast it to the ground. Why the audience was floored (note the pun)! The women fairly writhed in their seats! Dylan Thomas rolled over in his grave.

These wildly cheap theatrics were the most notable quality of the Davis lecture. His remarks had no recognizable organization. There was no beginning premise and no conclusion, only a mismash of unsupported assertions. He just did not do any homework.

He said that he looked to the "New Yorker" and "Poetry" magazine for examples of contemporary poetry because they "pay the most." Now I don't pretend to know how payment and quality relate but I do know at least a half dozen of the "slicks", "Harper's" and "Atlantic" to name two, pay more than the "New Yorker" and at least three major literary magazines pay about the same as "Poetry". By the way, Mr. Davis, how familiar are you with "Epoch", "Dust", "Abroxas", "New: Canadian & American Poetry", "Dam" or the "Intro" series. (These are a very few of the magazines publishing contemporary poetry.)

Davis' lecture included the partially concealed notion (He was careful to say nothing positive.) that popularity and sales are a yardstick for the vitality of an art. Can it really be that he doesn't know that Allen Ginsburg's "Howl and antly, of your friends and/or classmates.

All righty right, my brothers, let us begin to slash about. 1) I really don't see how this custom came to be evolved or perpetuated. Even supposing the wild chance of a class having a group of writers, actors, and technical people ready to go at a moments notice, I don't see how anyone has the right to bemoan what he gets. I have done several plays with only three weeks of rehearsals, but this was with a prewritten play and or very good, and experienced, theater group. Even so, it was rush, rush, rush. I should think that a theme could be decided early in the fall; it's not all that much trouble. Probably everyone will let it slide until very late, anyway, but when the class that doesn't procrastenate wins the cup they'll smarten up quick. 2) The only reason that the freshmen gave such a good production was the freshman acting experience modules. No doubt this will bring cries of outrage from jingoistic freshmen, but I believe that all the classes have approximately equal amounts of talent. Many of the main actors had been in one or more of these modules; they knew their own skill, they knew the stage, they knew the audience, and, most importantly, they knew who to use and how. I was seriously surprised that they didn't get second, even though I hadn't heard much of the play.

I don't think that anyone can ignore the correlation. Why are there so few opportunities of this kind for upperclassmen? I should think that the benefits would be far beyond a simple improvement in ACN plays — student theater is one of the most entertaining and uniting experiences which Juniata can possibly offer to its inmates. So, what can be done? Anything you like. Open the freshman classes to anyone who cares, establish classes for writing and production; or, if such can't be done, have more opportunity for students to field their own productions with as much or little faculty intervention as they wish. Of course, all this sounds good, and I can imagine you saying, "Golly gee whiz but that do sound great. Wish I had time to get into it." This is certainly a valid complaint; I'm a science major, I know. I certainly don't believe that everyone should be urged to get into the theater, some people just don't like it. But there are so many others, hoping for a good excuse, and/or a chance to try it just once, or to get back into it. This can be solved many ways (I'm not going to solve all your problems, my fingers are tiring). As one example, why not hold an All Class Night each term, with the eventual winner being that class which had amassed the most points? Plus other, non-class, competitions (with prizes, of course) could be held. Give them a nickel and they'll follow you anywhere.

3) Answering the other two would more or less solve this problem — as Mr. Davis pointed out, it is possible to be gross and sarcastic and yet do it so that people can laugh at something new about it every time they remember it, even the persons who were satirized. Consider the National Lampoon and The Firesign Theatre. More time to consider and rewrite would help this, and more overall experience would give the participants the requisite courage to try to get away from the Big Fast Laugh. The typically overlarge casts have been due not only to the wish to show class participation, but also because almost everyone in the class wants to have fun too, and this is about the only chance they have.

So, the overall answer to the All Class Night Question would seem to be not to let it slide, but to have more of the same, and to give more of the same, and to give more consideration to them. If the judges, faculty, and students expect high quality from these plays, then they are responsible for improving them. Dere jest ais't nobuddy else, people. Is it worth it? Think back over all the talent, imagination, and drive displayed on All Class Night, despite all the factors against it; think of the student response, year after year, and then ask yourself that question. I'm really annoyed that I had to do this at all —if everyone around here is so willing to criticize but not to look at even the most obvious solutions, there doesn't seem to be much point in continuing with anything. We are not just a collection of memory banks, we are a society of our own, and we must support it, change it, or leave it. We're big kids now; no more crying about how the high school faculty is repressing us and ruining things, we're free to run our own lives — much more so here at Juniata than at any other school I've known; perhaps not much happens, but that's not because of lack of potential. Take a good, long look inside your head. The answer is always there — if you care enough.

J.C. Receives Grant

Juniata College has received a grant of $6,740 from the National Science Foundation in support of a project entitled "Undergraduate Research Participation," Dr. John N. Stauffer, President of the College announced today.

In acknowledging the grant, Dr. Stauffer said. "It is a privilege to accept with hearty thanks the National Science Foundation grant for 'Undergraduate Research Participation' here at Juniata College. In behalf of our department of chemistry and especially in behalf of those students who will benefit through their participation in research projects, I would express appreciation to the Foundation for the grant."

The grant is intended to support student participation in research to be conducted by Dr. Paul D. Schettler, Jr., of the Juniata College department of chemistry.

Go Abroad For Real Excitement

Bruce Moyer, a political science major who is taking a leave of absence this year, has run into some excitement abroad. Bruce spent the first half of this year at American University in Washington, D.C. This half he is spending in London.

Bruce reports he is taking his classes at the Royal Commonwealth Society, which is right across from Westminister. While there, he has had a chance to witness much of the great debates that are going on over the Northern Ireland situation. While visiting Parliment, he has seen such figures as Bernadette Devlin and Prime Minister Heath.

However, the real excitement occured when the IRA was staging the London Bombings. He was in class, right across the street, when the Whitehall explosion occurred. He said the shockwaves from the blast knocked out the windows in the classroom, but fortunatly, no one in the room was injured. However, over 100 people were injured in the street.

Bruce will be back next year, and with stories like these to tell, he could interest a lot of adventure-seeking students to consider spending a year abroad.

Folk Festival—

Eighty-year old Elizabeth Cotton immediately won the admiration of the audience with her storied introductions to each of her songs. Her sets, with the inclusion of such tunes as "Jesus Lifted Me" and "Lord Remember, Me", were more gospel oriented that John's. This, plus her heart-warming "Freight Train", which became an instant favorite with the audience, transformed her sets into agonizing personal statements.

Plavi Sorgovan Tamburitza Orchestra, a local band from the Pittsburgh area specialzing in performing native Yugoslavian and other East European folk songs, provided an interesting deviation from American folk music that we're accustomed to. Consisting of two guitars, cello, and violin, the band sang (in Yugoslav) and played songs of bizzarre but funny topics: a girl getting kidnapped by some priests, or a girl guarded by dogs against an undesirable male, for example.

The Putnam String County Band finished up both the Saturday and Sunday night concerts. With cello, violin, guitar, and occassional mandolin, banjo, juice harp, the band rolicked through some familiar and some not so familiar traditional American tunes. Much of their material was orginal, such as the hilarious "Credit Card Song" and "Hard Luck Man", in which the singer expounded jokingly about his incredible tough life. Especially beautiful was "There's Something I've Been Meaning to Tell You," sung to the simple accompanyment of the cello.

Festivals like this are really special. It's refreshing to hear a kind of music and experience a subculture that is all but forgotten in today's world of Progressive Rock and Pop 40 programs. Here is a bunch of musicians who share a common interest: playing music for the hell of it; for self enjoyment and the enjoyment of others. The festival became all the more meaningful and sensitive with the extreme informality and the intimate contact between audience and performer through the use of jokes and stories. The audience was encouraged to sing along at any time. It was, therefore, a joy that Green Grass was brought among us here at Juniata. Let's have more of the same.

Trackmen Doing Well in Starters

Once again Juniata has come up with another strong track team. Under the new leadership of Coaches Rossi, Mitchell and Riley the team has compiled an impressive record of 5-2 losing a tough one of Lock Haven and powerful Bucknell. This year the team hopes to improve its MAC showing in the conference meet this weekend at Dickinson. Last year the team finished second losing the championship by 1 point. The team has worked hard all season and no one area can be isolated as the key to this year's success.

The conference championship will be held this weekend at Dickinson for all those interested. It appears Juniata has an excellent chance to capture the title.

Although the team has worked especially hard special recognition should be given to the mile relay team consisting of Joe Coradetti, Billy Thompson, Carl Koval and Mike Slough that finished third this past weekend in the MAC division of the Penn Relays.

J.C. Basemen Now Have 6-4 Record

With major league baseball just getting under way, the Indians are half way through their season already with a respectable 6-4 record. However the Indians have been playing much better than their record would indicate, averaging almost 9 runs a game and giving up only 5. Some shabby fielding along with some untimely walks hurt the Indians early in the season, and if these minor problems can be worked out the Indians could finish with a much better record than they presently have with ten games remaining. The rainmaker has dampened the Indians by raining out 3 conference games in 2 days.

Tommy Streightiff has been the most frequent base runner, while Mike McNeal and Dee Adcock have been providing most of the firepower with 3 and 1 home runs respectively.

So with the 10 remaining games Juniata has a chance to improve on its present record and finish with a strong showing in the MAC's. The next home game will be a doubleheader Thursday with Frostburg State and a doubleheader on Saturday at Delaware Valley.

other poems" has sold over 150,000 copies; that Lawrence Ferlinghetti's "A Coney Island of the Mind" has sold over 500,000 copies, and that dozens of new collections by young poets are published every month.

Davis' conviction that rock lyricists fill the gap caused by a lack of interest in poetry is suspect. He mentioned only the Beatles but such good lyricists as Bob Dylan, Paul Simon and, perhaps Leonard Cohen come off pretty wobbly without music. I've derieved many hours of pleasure listening to Bob Dylan but try, as I have, the following experiment. Alternate sides of Dylan (or pick your favorite) with Robert Frost or Dylan Thomas reading their own poems and I think you will agree that the former need their music to make the comparison at all valid. It's a little silly anyway, like comparing the work of a painter and a sculptor. The mediums are different and the comparisons and contrasts are finally not viable.

All but one of the poems read by Davis with any degree of seriousness were the work of deceased poets. I wonder if Mr. Davis is aware of the existence of Ginsburg, Fedlinghetti, Anne Sexton, W. D. Snodgrass, Thom Gunn, Ted Hughes, Robert Bly, James Wright, A. R. Ammons, or Sylvia Plath. This last young lady is, of course, dead but if living she would still be young and contemporary. Besides I thought that the professor may have missed the event and I wanted to bring him up to date.

Davis suggested that poetry is no longer a vital art but let's look at the activities at J.C. Bink Noll, a poet well known here, read earlier this year as did twofine young poets from Cornell, Gary French and Lyn Shoemaker. Over a half dozen J.C. students have conducted a poetry workshop, meeting weekly, since the middle of the first term. These actions do not sound like a death rattle to me.

As for Kvasir, including this publication in his remarks was, perhaps, the lowest blow of all. Kvasir is an undergraduate literary magazine. It contains the fledgling attempts of students. It doesn't pretend to include competition for Pound or Elliot. His remarks will undoubtably make it more difficult to get the necessary funding for our magazine but I'm sure he is not concerned.

As a student I have every right to expect from my professors the same deligence in research and sensitivity in analysis that they demand from me. This was definitely not the case with Mr. Davis' lecture. As a poet, since this is no time for false humility I eagerly clutch at this epithet, I was insulted and angered by this thoughtless display.

For shame, sir, for shame!

J.C.'s Spring Carnival - What Fun?

by Sue Blum

The May Day Weekend greeted us with thirty degree temperatures and 30 mile an hour winds. On Friday morning all the girls who chose to go, and the candidates for Prince Charming groggily got up to go to the breakfast held in Baker Dining Hall. All the candidates anxiously awaited to hear if they had won. The lucky queen was Mary White and the lucky Prince Charming as her escort was John Summerville. However there were two attendants from each class also.

At 6:00 the chaos began. When I first came upon the sacred site I noticed bits and pieces of egg falling on my shoulder. Then I looked up and what did I see two human like heads poked through plywood debris. They were screaming at the townies, tempting them to take out their frustrations upon the college students in the form of egg throwing. As I walked further down the alley of booths which looked like they were on their last legs the booths ranged from winning goldfish to eating ice cream waffles. Suprisingly, even though it was bitterly cold out and many a nose was red and windburned, people spent their money in hopes of winning a prize. As I walked further my nose caught the scent of pizza and my stomach was growling with hunger and for 25 cents I greedily horded two pieces down my throat. But then I notice as I walked on my stomach was full but what did I sight but more food, cotton candy, popcorn, ice cream and terrific milkshakes of which I had one. By now my ears were filled with noise and I turned my head in the direction of three monstrous contraptions one of which I ascended. The paratrooper I think it was called. It was only one of three fantastic rides offered at this carnival. As I got off dizzly I noticed a big balloon like structure near the road and people were jumping around in it. I found out later

State Prisoners Offered Writing Program By JC

by Patrick E. Fleagle

In a continuing educational liaison between Juniata College and the Huntingdon Correctional Institute, two members of the Juniata writing program staff, Mrs. Nancy Davis and Mrs. Freda Christopher, are teaching freshman writing program to 16 inmates at the local correctional institute. The program is structured much the same as the Juniata program with two classes of eight student-inmates each meeting with their instructors for a one hour workshop followed by half-hour individual tutorials.

According to Professor Gerald Croce, director of Juniata's program, the goal of the prison writing program, to instill the ability to write clear, argumentative, and concise prose." is identical to the campus program's goal. The prison writing program according to Croce, serves a double function, that of "servicing the nature of writing and communication.

Although several members of the writing program staff expressed initial misconceptions about the inmates, Croce, Davis, and Christopher expressed amazement at the individuality and the degree of sophistication that the inmates displayed. They were also impressed by the extreme commitment of the inmates and the amount of work they generate for the writing program. Both instructors Davis and Christopher stressed a change in their own personal outlooks and expressed commitment to a teaching experience which Mrs. Christipher labels as an "eye opener." Both instructors also noted that the institution's classroom atmosphere is a very comfortable one. Mrs. Christopher capsulized her feelings on the atmosphere by saying she felt "safer in the prison than on a New York City street corner."

While most of the inmates have expressed a desire to drop their criminal experiences, several have shown interest in relating their experiences in literary form with the help of the writing program. Robert Lakatos, Corrections Education Coordinator at Juniata, stressed the importance of giving the inmates an ability to bring these experiences into focus via the writing program instead of placing them in an alien introductory course in some other subject. Of those showing interest in relating their experiences their subject matter ranges from how to keep children from "going wrong" to the every day workings of a 'con' artist.

The distinct and varying dialects of the inmates have made the institute's writing program all the more interesting according to the two instructors. Mrs. Christopher finds the inmates 'language of the streets' very exciting and is pleased with the progress made in mastering these dialects. Mrs. Davis points out that most of her students are very shrewed talkers with great language fluidity and hopefully will transfere this oral tradition to the literary form.

Baer Tells Of Future Plans For Student Government 73-74

by Dave Baer

Not long ago I was involved in an election campaign for the presidency of Student Gov't. Since my election I have been confronted with several issues which I spoke to directly during my campaign. I feel that it's important that I inform the body I represent on what is currently happening on those issues and what my plans are for the future.

Dormitory Gov't. in the past few years has been plagued by problems of internal dissent and competition with the Senate over trivial matters. This past year the sexual dichotomy was eliminated thus creating a single Dorm Gov't. representing everyone. Currently a committee is writing a constitution for Dorm Gov't which we hope to have completed by next fall. What we are proposing is an efficient, yet representative Gov't. to offer student input into all matters of dormitory life on campus.

Judicial Revision was a big issue during the campaign. A joint student-faculty committee is now investigating the alternatives. It is expected that they will have a proposal for a new Judicial System before next fall. Also a newly created Student Legal Service headed by Dave Andrews and Tom Kurtz is projected to offer limited legal advise to students for both on and off-campus matters.

My greatest single concern on campus is in the area of faculty and academics. During a confrontation this spring with the faculty over representation on the personnel committee, I discovered that a surprising number of the faculty don't want to be held accountable for their decisions concerning students. I interpret this to mean "pay your money, go to class, get good grades, but don't bug me with your problems." I can think of no other institution in the world where the employees tell the financier how to operate the business. I can't fathom the rationale for JC being an exception. We must hold the faculty accountable to us.

Ultimately, I see the solution to the faculty situation and to many other student problems like the health service, food service, and entertainment as a product of a combined effort of students with Student Gov't. Gov't. alone cannot and will not work without student backing. It has been stated that apathy is everyone's burden and involvement is everyone's responsibility. Only if we as students accept our responsibilities will we derive the maximum benefit for our $3400 and at the same time do the most for JC.

I'm looking forward to an exciting year.

Sincerely,
Dave Baer

Ex-Convicts Portray Realistic Prison Life

by Rob Lopresti

Saturday night Juniata College was the scene of an excellent performance by a group of ex-convicts.

The play performed was "The Cage", written by ex-convict Rick Cluchey. The troupe, known as the Barbwire Theatre, has been performing it for five years across the country.

"The Cage" is a play about four people in a prison cell. Paul Hornbrook played a new prisoner arriving in a cell occupied by a lame homosexual, played by Bruce Neckles, a black man played by Gilbert Greene, and a madman played by Ken Whelan. As the new man's illusions about prison life are torn away so are the audiences and the result is shocking.

When the play was over the audience was invited to stay for the second half of the show — a "confrontation on prison reform".

This began with Whelan discussing the history of the Barbwire Theatre. It began when San Quentin witnessed a performance of "Waiting For Godot" and some prisoners decided to start their own theatre. Cluchey and Whalen among them. Eventually some who got out began touring with "The Cage".

The actors then asked for questions from the audience and got almost an hour's worth. They explained their theories on prison reform and discussed them with the people, and with the warden of the local correction institute.

"The Cage" was performed theatre-in-the-round-style in Oller Hall. It was both an educational and entertaining evening shared by a relatively large audience.

Star-Spangled Girl Full Of Chuckles

by Sam Sirrianni

Juniata will have a rare treat this weekend when the Totem theatre goes into the round to present Neil Simon's laugh filled play "Star Spangled Girl". Oller Hall on Thursday, Friday and Saturday at 8:15 p.m. will convert to the arena stage as three Juniatians take on the task of portraying Simon's winning characters. Steve Crowley, Brad Rudy, and Vicki Harris under the direction of Howard Crouch, bring to life these portraits with an unusual vim and vigor.

The production is open to all students. Please attend for a great night full of chuckles. This production will use you yourself in a great comedy just as Simon's "Odd Couple" and "Barefoot in the Park" have done before. We promise, no morals or values in this bright contempory comedy, just fun.

Food Service Gives Results Of Survey

by Dave MacVeigh

The results of the food survey which was taken in late February have been tabulated, according to Ed Straub, of Hallmark Management Service.

The top three choices of the students, listed in order, based both on the number of times that each appeared on the surveys, and on how the students ranked them in preference are:

Breakfast Entrees: French Toast, Scrambled Eggs, Doughnuts; Breakfast Fruits and Juices: Orange Juice, Grape Juice, Fresh Quartered Oranges;

Luncheon Entrees: Bacon-Lettuce-Tomato Sandwich, Cheeseburgers, Hamburgers; Luncheon Desserts: Fresh Fruit Cocktail, Assorted Ice Cream;

Dinner Entrees: Spaghetti w/ Meat Sauce, Lasagna, Roast Beef, Dinner Desserts: Strawberry Shortcake, Watermelon, Eclairs;

Salads: Tossed Green Salad, Chef's Salad, Waldorf; Salad Dressings: Thousand Island Dressing, Garlic French Dressing, Russian Dressing;

Vegetables: Whole Kernel Corn, Peas, Cauliflower;

Potatoes: French Fries, Whipped Hashed Browns.

Straub said that after consulting with Hallmark's home office, he decided not to respond to Henry Siedzikowski's editorial about the food service which appeared in the Juniatian several weeks ago. He only said that contract feeding at Juniata has proven itself to be the cheapest way to feed students, rather than a pay-as-you-go-plan.

He also noted that the 5¢ charge for not having the meal ticket is donated to the Student Emergency Loan Fund.

Noise and Nuisance

Last Wednesday night, May 2, I came back to South Hall around twelve to go to sleep, only to be kept awake for at least an hour by the most disgusting display of ignorance I have heard in a long time. Several drunken boys (I hesitate to use the word men and I hope they were drunk or else they had absolutely no excuse for their actions) were screaming outside the dorm. It is not the noise level which bothered me as much as what was said. I have little occassion to hear language as crude as that. The males I know have more respect for girls than to say such things in front of a girl. I am no prude but there are limits of decency and points where individuals encroach on other's rights.

But not only were guys involved but many girls in South were egging them on. If they enjoy that kind of display it says little for them, but they should enjoy it privately and not cause a whole dorm to be exposed to such indecency.

How someone goes about soliciting dates is their business but it should be kept their business and not public information. Is it any wonder that the enrollment of girls has dropped at Juniata?

Field Work for J.C.

Though I am no longer a Juniata College student, I would greatly appreciate your printing this letter in "The Juniatian", as I'm sure that many students will at least be interested in reading of the program this article concerns.

The article itself is entitled "Students Earn a Year's Credit for Aiding Poor", is written by Gene I. Maeroff, and is taken from the November 28, 1972 issue of the New York Times.

As to the plausibility of such a program being instigated at Juniata College, I can only say that before I left, I showed the article to Dr. Robert Wagoner, and he said that there were some definite possibilities for such action. For the student who is tired of sitting in the classroom, being indoctrinated in the ways of factual knowledge, and finding him(her)self drifting further and further from the "real" world, this program could definitely fill a demanding gap is that individual's education.

I should also appreciate it if the content of the previous paragraph (especially as to the first sentence), could also be relayed through the newspaper. Thanks.

Sincerely,
John "Si" Towler

On a campus where the word apathy has become a watchward in every student government election, it is very rare to find an issue which seems to interest everyone. Up to now, only the quality of the food and the drinking policy has risen to these lofty hieghts. However, it seems there is now a challenger for the position of the most talked about problem on Juniata's campus, an enviable position, to say the least. That problem is the lack of entertainment.

First, let me say that, contrary to popular opinion, there is some very good entertainment on campus. Just last weekend, "The Cage", an excellent play was performed in Oller Hall. It was about as well attended as any of that type of entertainment ever is. However, this is not a review of the play, there are other more important points to be made.

It just so happens, that last weekend was also Spring Carnival Weekend. Very few people would even raise an eyebrow if I said the carnival was much better attended than the play. But, in my traditional style, I must shock everyone by reporting that both attracted simalar numbers of college students.

Before any recovery, I must clarify a point. No one had to shut the doors of Oller to keep opt the hordes. In case you still miss the point, the carnival just did not attract over-whelming numbers of students.

This deserves some notice, especially in light of the recent controversy over the value of All Class Night. These are traditional events which pull the campus together. They should be looked forward to with great anticipation. Instead, it no longer seems impossible for both to die.

This is a situation which must be attacked head on. Since Center

THE BIG HOUSE

Gore Vidal has written perhaps one of the most timely plays in history. I can only say that it's a shame that Mr. Vidal couldn't have written his play after the Watergate affair. There is no doubt enough material in Watergate alone to write a play on. Mr. Vidal, beginning with Nixon's birth in Whittier California, satirically follows the President throughout his political career which began in grade school until November, 6, 1971 when New Republic quoted him as saying, "Fuck the A.B.A.", referring to the American Bar Association when they turned down his two choices for Supreme Court Justices.

The text is composed of numerous authentic quotes (such as the aforementioned) and some apocryphal dialogue thrown in by the author. In the back of the play can be found every quote, the news agency, and the date that the quote was taken.

Mr. Vidal has done what every U.S. citizen should do. He simply compared what the President is doing and saying now with what the President did and said in the past. This type of analysis should be done with every elected official.

Mr. Vidal made the point that a forgetful public or an apathetic public is a breeding ground for corrupt politicians. With all the mass media this nation has a politician still can rely on the fact that soon most of the public will forget all of his mistakes.

In An Evening With Richard Nixon Vidal haunts the President with his past, a hideous punishment indeed. The play is complete with special guest appearances by George Washington, John F. Kennedy, Dwight D. Eisenhower, Lt. William Calley, Jr. and many others.

A toppled cherry tree is conspicuously placed at stage front throughout the play. At the conclusion of the play we find out who really chopped it down.

I suggest that you read this hysterical political attack, lest you forget!

The average Navy Pilot isn't.

No man who has mastered the flying skills it takes to fly and land on a ship at sea can be called an average pilot. And the sense of accomplishment and satisfaction that he enjoys are also above average. Which is only right. For the man who would go places as a Naval Aviator must pass through the most challenging and demanding training program to be found anywhere.

From Aviation Officer Candidate School through Flight Training to the day his golden Navy Wings are awarded, he is tested; driven; pushed and tested again. And for good reason. The Navy has learned that without the will to succeed, no man can be successful.

Recently, I was gifted with a copy of the book "Jonathan Livingston Seagull". Have you read it? Like so many of today's 'hurrying mortals, I had read about this charming little story but hadn't gotten around to actually reading it. One is always safer in this position than in the continuing awkward posture of having one's concepts of life distorted by new knowledge.

Education is a self-awareness problem. . To elevate yourself from the de-humanizing level of a functioning but non-thinking robot into the freedom of an individual who contributes to the furthering of the race, you must become involved in self-awareness. When you start questioning yourself about the who yourself is, rather than just accepting the who you are that everyone tells you you are, then from that moment on, the world takes on a dizzying challenge for you.

To confuse the wicked among us, who delight in murdering imagination, every now and then a book is published as a mental shield to aid us in our quest for knowing ourselves. Far better that we do not 'rock' the boat of being and thinking like everyone else, they tell us. The wicked, I mean. But then, a simple little book, wrong, a book written in simple language, easy to read, easy to understand, comes our way and our heart wakes up with a joyousness of knowing that what the book is saying, is so, is right. Why in the name of all that is for the good of man, hasn't the Church told us. It's their business. . .or so they tell us.

A handful of years backward in time there was published another short book dealing with some of the eternal mysteries of existence. The wicked said, "charming, but naive", and attempted to dismiss it. But it has steadily gone forth taking us by the hand, mentally speaking, and as with a child, led us into a greater understanding of the 'who' we are and how to cope with that uncomfortable knowledge.

The work I am referring to is Kahlil Gibran's "The Prophet". Have you read it?

If the fear of death plagues you or the fear of life, then find yourself a corner of time and enrich into these peaceable kingdoms, either "The Prophet" or "Jonathan Livingston Seagull".

As Jonathan tells Maynard, "You have the freedom to be yourself, here and now, and nothing can stand in your way. It is the Law of the Great Gull, the Law that Is."

Tri Football Captains: Eckerl, McNeal & Johnston Chosen For Upcoming Season

Fullback Eckerl, slotback Mike McNeal and defensive tackle Larry Johnston have been elected tri-captains of the 1973 Juniata College football team

All three will be seniors this fall and were key performers during the 1972 campaign. They were selected for their leadership qualities and potential to help the squad during the upcoming season.

Eckerl gained 333 yards on 77 carries last year, including 119 against Western Maryland. He also caught five passes for 75 yards, one for a touchdown, crossed the goal line three other times on the ground, and completed the only pass he threw for 18 yards. A three year letter winner in football, Eckerl also won letters in baseball during the 1971 and 1972 campaigns. He is a graduate of Cardinal Gibbons High School in Baltimore, Md.

J.C.'s Annual Spring Carnival was entertaining to all.

McNeal was the leading rusher on the 1972 squad with 353 yards on 80 carries. He scored three touchdowns on the ground and caught 15 passes for 198 yards, second best on the squad. His all-round kicking talent enabled him to lead the team in scoring with 45 points, including a perfect 21-21 extra point mark. A three-year letter winner in football, McNeal also played baseball in 1971 and 1972, leading the team in hitting last spring with a .395 average. He is a graduate of Huntingdon Area High School.

Johnston has been one of the stalwarts on the Juniata defensive line for three seasons, earning three monograms. He made 58 tackles during 1972 even though he missed two games due to a knee injury. Johnston is a graduate of Greensburg Catholic Central High School.

Juniata finished the 1972 season with four straight victories for a 6-3 record, 5-1 in the Northern Division of the Middle Atlantic Conference.

Board is the body on campus which has been delegated authority in this area, we must look to them. Solutions are needed, and, hopefully this years Center Board will attack the problems aggresively. If they are to do this, they will need organization. Again, the student is left to only hope that the year will not be simalar to the farce, that was the Center Board elections.

That election saw the use of such "careful" techniques as leaving names off the ballot, and having no system of telling who was voting. Hardly a paragon of organization.

So, as we look forward to the new beginning that next year will bring, we congratulate those who won Center Board positions, and we express our sincere hope that these people can get away from some recent traditions, in order to save some older, and I might add valuable ones.

nel are very optimistic at the signs of success the writing program has shown so far. One of the success gauges cited by all four is the breakdown of the psychological barrier to free writing. According to Professor Croce, there has been "fantastic improvement in the depth of the inmates writing and their freedom of expression."

Mr. Lakatos expressed optimism that the institute's writing program, presently funded by the Governor's Justice Commission, the Pennsylvania Bureau of Corrections, and Juniata College, will receive additional funds for continuation of the program. Also, Mrs. Christopher expressed the hope that the program can be expanded at the Institute itself to include several publications such as an inmate — newspaper or magazine.

this was the moon bounce. Wow! You could even be an astronaut right in the yard of Juniata College. As I had finished my rounds of the carnival I thought, something was missing. Yes, the band. Where was the band? To my relief the next day I found that the band was to play Saturday afternoon. However after it was all over and I had aquired a squeezy stomach, a dizzy head, freezing feet, and my goldfish, I was pooped from all the excitement. The only energy I had left was used in a smile.

1 and 2 and the meet was in the bag. The mile relay was the only event left and this was our best event. As icing on the cake we proved to be the best and finished 1st. So it was over and we had not only won we had dominated the meet the final score was Juniata 51 and our nearest competitor Widner 38. As we all cheered there was the doubt would things have been different if Johnson hadn't pulled up. After some thinking and talking something was brought up. Ron Tomcavage was hurt throughout the meet and was not up to par. Versatile Ron could match the point production of Johnson of anybody. So let the question rest and let us join in congradualations to the new MAC champs on a great job.

1. Normally only one unit may be taken GBE during a given summer.
2. Reasons should be provided to explain why the unit in question is to be taken GBE rather than on a regular basis.
3. The student will be expected to be on campus for his examinations during the summer term in question, and should be enrolled concurrently in at least one unit on a regular basis.

Track Meets Prove Exciting

by Gary Gillen

As we walked onto the field you could feel the tension that was around. We saw Doc Mitchell and he told us we were in real good shape. Almost everybody had qualified and Johnson the top sprinter from Widner had pulled up lame. We all knew that Juniata had an excellent chance of revenging last years 1 point defeat and with Juniata's faithful supporters making up the majority of the crowd we waited in eager anticipation. We had gotten off to a good start Friday with Joe Cordetti coming up with a second in the triple jump and most of the rest of the team qualifying now if we could only do as well as we did on Friday we would be set. As we where waiting for the running events we walked down just in time to see Oof Haugen get off a tremendous heave of 55 feet 1 inch for a new MAC record. Vince Yaniga however got off a very good throw of 44 feet 10 inches to get him 4th place and valuble points. Now the running events were getting way The first event was the 440 relay and we all sat back hoping for a first. However some fine running by Dickinson hampered the Indians as we lost in a photo finish. Next was the mile and Paul Wilson run one of his best races but it didn't prove to be enough as he finished out of the top 5. Now came the 440. Mike Slough proved to be the class of the field running a 49.5 for a new school record. Bill Thompson also ran one of his best races and finished 4th. The next big race was the 100. Rick Rudolph ran a strong race and appeared to finish 4th. However when the official announced the results Rudolf was left out. In the 880 Carl Koval ran his best time this year and finished 3rd with a 1.56.5. As we sat waiting for the next event we saw Mike Winterstein get off a tremendous throw. we weren't sure just how good it was but by Mike's jubiliant reaction we knew it was good and when it was announced a new school and good enough for third. Now one of the finest performances of the meet was in the making. Joe Cordetti was in 2nd place in the long jump by 4 inches and had one jump left. Joe jumped a jump of 22feet 7 inches good enough for first place then ran across the field and took his place for the intermediate hurdles. Once again Joe came through and finished first with a time of 54.7. As the crowd sat back the field announcer stated that jumping now was the current MAC champ in the pole vault Robert Zimmerman. Zimmy had given all of us a scare with his first 2 jumps just going into the pit. Now we all sat back and hoped Zimmy was just playing around on his first 2 jumps. As he raced down the way we all held our breath but Zimmy went up and over clearing the bar easily. Zimmy went on to easily outclass the field and set a new MAC record and school record with a jump of 14.8¾. Danny Bausher finished second with a jump of 12.6. The 220 was now set to go and here we had Mike Slough and Rick Rudolph. It was a race all the way with Mike getting edged out at the finish, however Rudolph came through with a strong race and we had 2nd and 4th. Now it was up in the air. We had no one in the 2 mile and this was where Widner was strongest. If Widner could sweep the 2 mile we would be in trouble. So we waited and routed for Swathmore to come through in the clutch. As it turned out the luck was on our side. Swathmore finished

Basemen Attempt Better Record

by Gery Gillen

This last week proved to be quite advantageous to the Indians baseball squad. The Indians have won 3 of their last 4 games, splitting a doubleheader with Frostburg State, which was nationally ranked last year, and taking both ends of a doubleheader from Delaware Valley knocking them out of contention for the MAC title.

On Saturday Juniata rode the 1 hit pitching of Mark Amatucci to the 1-0 victory. The Delaware Valley hurler also had a 1 hitter but that hit proved to be quite costly as it was a home run to Craig Polardy. In the second game Juniata got another 1 hit performance this time from Jim Slovik to win 7-1. Last Thursday against powerful Frostburg Juniata was soundly defeated in the first game despite some good hitting by Dee Adcock. The second game was a real thriller with Juniata winning in extra innings behind the strong of Lou Eckerl and with Mike McNeal driving in the winning run.

Juniata is now 10-5 and has an excellent chance of going to the ECAC tournament. If the Indians can win their remaining games with Penn State and Gettysburg, both tough teams, the Indians appear to have a good shot at the post season tournament. Juniata has played top competition all year with 4 of it lossss coming against much bigger schools. The Penn State game is today at Penn State with the regular season being wrapped up tomorrow, Thursday, with Gettsburg.

French Club Offers Talk By Chapman

by Dave MacVeigh

The French Club, in cooperation with Division I and the Foreign Language Studies Department, is sponsoring a lecture entitled "Moliere in an English Garb." The lecture, presented by Dr. Hugh H. Chapman, Jr., professor of Romance languages at Penn State, is to be held tomorrow, May 17, at 8:15 in Shoemaker Galleries. A reception will be held directly following the lecture, which will be in English.

Although he has written papers about authors such as Bello, Lorca, Iriarte, and Goethe, Chapman's main interest is in the relationship between the great 17th century French dramatist and the English-speaking world, the subject of his Harvard doctoral dissertation. His articles and reviews have been published in Hispanic Review, Hispania, Comparative Literature, the French Review, and the Modern Language Journal, among others.

Chapman organized a conference at Penn State in February in commemoration of the 300th anniversary of the death of Moliere, who died immediately after performing his latest comedy: ironically entitled The Imaginary Invalid.

"Star-Spangled Girl" Brings Laughs

by Cindy Sczerba

"The Star-Spangled Girl," Neil Simon's hit Broadway comedy was presented by Juniata College May 10, 11, and 12. The play was done arena style and Dr. Howard Crouch, director of the comedy, greeted everyone with a smile and helped find seats. The place was certainly packed the first night and everyone bubbled over with laughter at the riotously amusing play.

The action of the play began in a duplex studio apartment in San Francisco. The apartment was the residence of Andy Hobart (played by Steve Crowley) and Norman Cornell (played by Brad Rudy), two offbeat guys who used their home as an office for their magazine, "Fallout." Norman spent a lot of time fending off the phone-calling, money-collecting, Mr. Franklin and also going surfing or cycling with the landlady so she wouldn't raise the rent.

Norman, on the other hand, couldn't help thinking how nice it would be if a nice brunette would move next door.—Knock, Knock, "Hello, I'm Sophie Rauschmeyer and I just moved in next door."— Of course Sophie was a brunette and of course Norman thought his problems were solved, but they were just beginning for everyone.

Miss Rauschmeyer (played by Vicki Harris) was an All-American Southern belle who just happened to be engaged to a Marine. Norman didn't care though, he was enchanted with her smell and also thought she had the most perfectly shaped earlobes he had ever seen. He tried everything to sway her to his side. He wrote love notes on the stairs, he faithfully watched her through

Field Work Offers Variety For Many College Students

Ed. Note: This is the article that was promised in last week's Letters To The Editor. It is reprinted from the New York Times.

Students from Queens College in New York are helping residents of a housing project to organize a tenant's association. Students from Federal City College in Washington are teaching expectant mothers about nutrition. Students from the University of Colorado are operating a learning center on an Indian reservation.

And all the students are receiving a full year of academic credit without entering a classroom, except perhaps for an occasional seminar.

They are among 1,100 students at 24 colleges and universities who are full-time volunteers in the Federal Government University Year for ACTION Program, which enables students to aid poor people without having to drop out of school to delay completion of the regular degree work.

University Year for ACTION, called U.Y.A., was the first new program launched by ACTION, the agency formed in 1971 by the merger of the Peace Corps, Vista, and several other service programs.

Now, as the program moves into its second year, it is apparently proving to meet the needs of some students seeking to get out of the classroom and put theory into practice. But observers say its main shortcoming would seem to revolve about the difficulty of insuring that such as experience is of academic value.

The purpose of the programs, the Government says, is "to alleviate poverty through the application of a university's resources and to assist universities in providing their students with an experience based curriculum."

Coming in an era in which students are demanding relevancy, as well as opportunities to take a break from the classrooms, the program seems especially timely in its appeal. In fact, participating colleges and universities have had on the average of five applications for each opening in the program.

Classroom experience becomes meaningless after a while and you look for ways to put your learning in the context of the real world," says 22-year old Gregory Mantosis, a bearded graduate student, who was selected as a volunteer by Queens College.

Mr. Mantosis is spending the year helping to establish a community center in the Astoria section of Queens, where his fluency in Greek has sometimes been an asset. After completing the program, Mr. Mantosis will have to earn an additional 14 credit hours to obtain his master's degree in urban studies.

Most participating institutions have graduate students involved. Lynn Girton, a 24-year old graduate student at the University of Massachusetts, for instance, is counseling inmates at the Hammpshire County House of Correction in Northhampton, Mass.

About 10 percent of the program's volunteers through the country are graduate students. Most are juniors and seniors.

The majority of students get simply a ("pass" or "fail" grade for the year's experience, but a few schools give a letter grade.

Despite their generally favorable attitude toward University Year for ACTION, some volunteers are skeptical. Also, they mention "the political control that can be exerted over the volunteers because there heads"— though there is no indica- are credits hanging over their tion of the control having been so used.

Some professiors have their own reservations, relating to the programs' academic value and the loose structure, which is seen as making it easy for students not to divest the proper time.

Mixed Feelings About Fischer's Poetry Reading

by J. G. McDonald

For those few of you who may not know him, Douglas R. Fischer is an assistant professor of English at J.C. His poetry reading which bore the above title was presented Thursday evening at Shoemaker Galleries.

Mr. Fischer's reading was an uneven affair. We were all presented with a printed copy of his opening poem, "One Seed" and this was a nice touch. But two things immediately interfered with my positive response to this good beginning.

Fischer normally a soft-spoken man remained so and this made a concentration of attention difficult. I could have overcome this problem were it not for the second dulling effect. Fischer has this notion that his poems will be more effective if printed on variously colored papers with a variety of colored inks. He prefaced each poem with a discussion of this visual effect. On Thursday night I tried to ignore it. On Friday afternoon, while talking to Fischer in his office, I commented that I felt that the visual effects would be gimmickry but perhaps not much more than, say, end rhyme or alliteration. Right now (At 2:10 Monday morning.), I'm in no mood for bullshit. The colored paper and ink rap is nonsense. It will add nothing to those poems that work and won't save the ones that don't.

Moving on to the poems themselves, he read over twenty from which I selected eight to reread and study more intently. I feel these eight are a fair sampling and include the best of the lot.

Fischer's biggest problem, a common one for young poets, is that of sentiment. I do not mean that he is a mushy sentimentalist; he's not. He is a man of obvious sensitivity and intelligence who has the courage to speak from the gut. But this proclivity frequently betrays his artistry. It is one thing to observe correctly and react pasionately. It's quite another story to transfer that passion into a poetic statement.

A specific example is "Newborn In Suntime", a poem concerning the birth of his son, Seth. The poem pivots on the notion that American men are raised to believe that crying is unmanly. This is flatly stated, "but I'm a man./ And men don't cry." I agree but I'm not moved by this not particularly unique observation. The problem is that he just says it. He doesn't show it. He doesn't make me feel the emotion. He simply tells me that he does. The poem is not profound but worse it makes me, the reader/ listener, feel outside the action of the poem. I cannot react strongly to what is obviously someone else's intimacy.

The second section of the poem is another tale.

Sachs To Work As Researcher This Summer

Stephen M. Sachs, a junior with a pre-medicine major, has been chosen to participate in the 20th Research Participation Program in Science at the Roswell Park Memorial in Buffalo, New York, June 18 through August 24.

Steve is the only Juniatian undergrad to be selected for the interesting opportunity to research under the guidance of the New York State Department of Health. High school students, undergraduate college students, graduate medical and dental students and college teachers are the personnel who will participate in the program.

Actual laboratory research supplemented by lectures, seminars, and scientific films, will be what Steve will spend his summer doing. He will work with Dr. Elias Cohen in the field of Immunchematology. Sachs' work will consist of critiquing lectures and spending 40 hours per week on program work with progress reports accounting for skills and knowledge gained and detailed accounts of his individual research project.

The Roswell Memorial Institute is one of the oldest cancer research educational and treatment facilities in the world. It was there that Drs. Carl and Betty Cari, Nobel Prize winners, did early work on carbohydrate metabolism. The institute has a staff of 2000 including 150 M.D.'s, 150 Ph.D.'s, and 500 assisting scientific workers.

Sachs will be working under the following objectives: 1) to expose him to an atmosphere of intensive research where he is in daily contact with science personnel with challenges being offered every step of the way; 2) to enable him to develop his own scientific creativity; and 3) to assist in career planning.

Here at school, Steve is president of the Senior class, a member of Men's House, Tri-Beta Biological Honor Society and the school Honor Society. He carries a 3.95 average, and has attained a perfect 4.0 mark six times.

A resident of Mt. Union, Steve graduated from Mt. Union High School. In high school he was a member of the wrestling team, the student council, National Honor Society, French club and varsity club. Steve was valedictorian of his class. He received the McCallias Daily News Award, the Dave Saxe Scholarship Award and the Bausch and Lomb Science Award.

Raft Reqatta To Be Held on Saturday

by Sue Blum

Yes, again, Juniata will be holding a raft reqatta on Saturday, May 19, 1973. So if you plan on eating lunch, make it a fast meal for the race starts at 1:00 P.M. The regatta is open to the total college community. The deposit is five dollars for entering, however if you are one of the winners there are cash prizes. Even if you are not one of the entries, come and watch, for all the rafts will be really original. No commercially manufactured water vehicles will be permitted. The judges will look for a well constructed raft, a good theme, and the position of finishing in the race. Rules for the race are at the information desk. Prizes are: first $100, second $50, third $25, fourth $15, and fifth $10. It is worth it to be there, if not for the money, just for the fun.

Greetings Pigs

Juniata students have a remarkable capacity for complaining and otherwise shooting off at the mouth (otherwise known as oral dysentery). This spewing forth of sounds normally does not concern national, state, world or local issues (except where it directly affects them). Rather, this noise pollution deals, for a large part, with aspects of campus life-particularly the food service.

Now, I must say, I've heard many a complaint about the food service. I've heard a number of valid complaints. And, I must say, I think it's about time that the nice kiddies around here realize who is the cause of many of these conditions. Introspection, you might say, is what we need. Yes, it is you, typical Juniata student, who is the criminal.

There are complaints about the high and rising costs of the food service here. And why do you think the costs are so high? The typical college resident is the answer, who also happens to be a supreme rip-off. Yes, it is great fun to rip off trays, dishes, glasses, silverware and so on. And yes, this problem is serious. A few weeks ago, the food service bought much new silverware. For once, I could fill the racks in the lines in the mornings and still have a good bit of silverware left over. Now, I cannot even completely fill the racks. Now really, it mightn't be so bad if only the food service got these back sometime. It might not even be quite so bad as it is if people would keep the articles and use them. Instead, these articles wind up in the great catch-all—file 13—the storage place of the modern American—that is, the trash. I've heard the complaint "But, I'm paying for it." I'm paying for the college tracks, too, but that doesn't mean I'm entitled to steal them. Or the dormitory either.

Secondly, I may hear complaints about dirty dishes. Now who the hell do you think you all are, miss goody cleanasses?!? I've seen some of the most disgusting messes come into the dish room. Fact is, the workers in the dishroom are often too busy to do all the work. And everybody eating there makes it worse. Here are a few ways you can make it better (lot of good this will do! !): 1. Try not to use another plate for everything. After all, it won't hurt more soup for instance to be put in the bowl of soup you just finished. 2. Don't spread your garbage all over the place. Garbage is easiest for us to dispose of if you dump it all onto your main plate—honest. And please don't leave garbage on your trays. And For God's sake don't put bubblegum on your trays. 3. Throw away your trash. Please. 4. Don't sit for long periods letting the food dry on your plate. Especially, if you've just had fried eggs. We don't always have time to scrub your plates. 5. Don't stuff shit into your glasses. I, for one, am not about to take the time to pull napkins, etc. out of glasses. 6. Don't sit for hours after the end of the meal. We do have to finish up in the dishroom, you know. 7. And, the most disgusting thing of all—smoking cigarettes in the cafeteria. Have you ever noticed black smudges on your dishes? Yeah, you guessed it—cigarette ashes. They don't come off in the dishwasher. Not only do cigarettes cause these smudges, but the ashes in the garbage look revolting and smell worse. What's more, smoking in the dining hall is rude, inconsiderate, disgusting and not too good healthwise for people sitting around you. Cigarette smoking is one of the most disgusting habits I can think of. You can play around with worms at the table, for all I care, as long as I don't have to breath your goddamn cigarette smoke. And I can give you a hell of a list of reasons against smoking, if you want them.

I'm not even going to talk about food, since most people around here wouldn't recognize good food if they drowned in it. Though, I do agree, that I see too much grease and other things. But it's up to you to do something about that, also.

I want to make something clear in finishing. The dishroom workers aren't necessarily angels or anything close to such a state! After all, they're students too. But they do happen to be working students.

EDITORIAL

by Henry Siedzikowski

Being a newspaper editor, even if the paper is only the Juniatian, one develops an ever persisting urge to sit back and pass judgement on almost anything that happens. And, if nothing is happening, you go out and find something.

Well, the Juniata scene is calm. So, I dutifully look to the beyond for a subject on which to ponder. As it happens, there is a very hot topic floating around, just waiting for the self-declared experts to comment on it. That topic of course is Watergate.

As I say it, I can just hear all the moans. "Can't we ever get away from that". I beg you to hold on for a few minutes, though. I may have an angle no one else has analyzed yet.

Just recently, Mr. Nixon signed into law, a bill passed by Congress funding all the current financial aid provisions for another year. Mr. Nixon had earlier expressed his opposition to this because he termed it an inflationary measure.

It seems Mr. Nixon signed this bill because, with Watergate hanging around his neck, he is no longer in a strong position to challenge Congress. This has interesting implications for students.

There are several bills, now under consideration in Congress which are of upmost interest to students. Among them are the funding for the Basic Oppurtunity Grants, and the question of whether students should be paid the full minimum wage.

If students can win their position in Congress, it seems likely now, that they will get past the President. What this all means is that this is an opportune time for schools belonging to the National Students Lobby, of which Juniata is one, to really make a push for legislation in their behalf.

So, if you are interested in any national issues, stop in and talk to someone in Student Government and try to get something organized. You might be surprised to find out how effective you can be.

THE BIG HOUSE

by Rick Boyer

In this aftermath - of - the - rock - boom period, record companies seem to thrive on the releases of previously recorded material in the form of "greatest hits" or "anthology" albums. Since companies are out for the bread only, the material chosen for these albums tends to be heavily commercial and Pop-40 oriented. Thus, we find, in the Beatles anthology, such classic R&B numbers "I'm Down" and "She's A Woman" being substituted by their big commercial successes.

The just released "Quicksilver Anthology" is an obvious departure from the usual anthology format. Rather than a "best of" (material that had the most sales) album, which may have been a straight re-release of their first album and "Just For Love", "Anthology" is a collection of songs which beautifully illustriates all the style changes Quicksilver has gone through since their first album, released in early 1968. Whoever put this together deserves credit, because he or she kept the term anthology in mind. "Quicksilver Anthology" really "tells" the story of the band.

Opening the album is "Pride of Man", an original folk song bended into that early Quicksilver brand of rock. This and the next cut, "Dino's Song", feature the lead guitar of John Cipollina. In the latter song, his guitar line is very infectious and catches the listener's attention immediately, causing him to forget the churning rhythm section. "The Fool" shows Quicksilver at their best: when they jam. Being 12 minutes long, the song goes through so many style changes, that it bewilders the mind. It begins with a few guitar chords supported by a viola. With the addition of percussion, the guitar begins to move along. The bass comes thundering in and the band begins a series of semi- build ups, culminating in a strange wah-wah lead part. The vocal begins almost two-thirds of the way through and the same build up process seems to start again. It does, but ends rather quickly. These three songs comprise side one and can all be found on Quicksilver's first album.

Side two begins with "Bears", a song that should be left up to individual taste. It contains some bizarre noises that are supposed to be funny, but, otherwise, its nothing special. Next, we have "Mona", an old Bo Diddley song and my personal Quicksilver favorite. Quite frankly, it leaves Bo Diddley far behind. Supported by a driving rhythm section, John Cipollina delivers the best lead guitar I've ever heard him play. Its hard to describe, but he certainly uses all the possible electronic capabilities of his guitar. It's not just feedback and wah-wah (or whatever) for loudness and show-off though. It is structured and forms an integral part of the song. In short, its a beautiful performance.

"Edward, The Mad Shirt Grinder" marks the addition of Nicky Hopkins to the group and, subsequently, the end of old style Quicksilver. Its ironic that this song and "Mona" should be placed next to each other on the record. The change is abrupt. "Edward" is dominated by Hopkins' lush piano while the guitar and rhythm section is submerged.

Sides three and four show Quicksilver going through further changes stylistically, though not as drastic as that between "Mona" and "Edward". Their style here is merely extensions of the new style Quicksilver.

The big favorite and most representative song of the new Quicksilver, "Fresh Air", is included. John Cipillina, who was soon to split from the band, shines again on "Local Color". Side four contains four cuts from "Quicksilver", their second to last album. They are texturally nice, but are somehow mediocre and lack the excitement of early Quicksilver. Fortunately, "What About Me", with its fine horn arrangement, is included here.

Many people may complain about the selections chosen for this album. I do miss "Who Do You Love?", the entire first side of "Happy Trails", and I wonder why no cuts from their last release, "Comin' Thru", were included. However, this is minor. "Anthology" is a fine album; well worth the price of a two record set.

Changing Sex-Rates In Changing Society

Interested people at J.C. have formed a Commission on the status of women. They have, at present, a three-fold purpose. 1) To plan a women's awareness week for 1st term next year. 2) To create a women's resource center on camus and 3) to design, initially, a tutorial in women's studies with a long range purpose of submitting units on women's studies for academic credit. The tutorial will consist of an in-depth study of women's problems in contemporary society with particular emphasis on women's problems and positions in education.

The Commission was formed to speak to special problems women encounter in a male oriented society and will attempt to create and foster an awareness on campus of such problems. The resource center will provide literature on women's problems, rights and women's place in American society (and anything else we can get our hands on). It invites and encourages participation by both women and men interested in changing Sex rates in a changing society.

Interested individuals (students, faculty, administrative) are welcome. Contact J. Jones, K. Gabriel, J. Lewis, M. Roberts, F. Shoemaker or Eileen Fleig for future information.

Fischer's poetry—

But your mother's glad-tired, and I'm too much a man.
So you can cry for all of us."

The language is still stark but it's working here. I can identify with that "I" in the fourth line. A newborn babe already taking on some responsibility. His need for attention being blunted by the counter needs of the parents. These are unique suggestions. And it's not being shoved down my throat.

The rest of the poem is more telling rather than showing dragging down that solid second section and leading to the final question.

"What I wonder is How soon will we know that we're free?"

It is just this kind of pseudo-philosophical comment that kills so much contemporary poetry. These same criticisms can be leveled at most of Fischer's poetry.

Now that I've paid half of my debt to the two-faced goddess, Honesty; I can cross to the other side of the altar. Now, the good news—

When Doug Fischer writes a good poem; it sticks with you. Take the opening poem for the reading, "One Seed". The opening two lines are:

"Come into the garden with me
And we'll plant one seed together,"

All right! The reader has an entrance to the poem. The ambiguity, the conotative value of words and the imagery that were missing before are here apparent. The piece ends with these three lines.

"The earth smells moist, and is warm to touch:
We'll trust in rain and sun
Together."

I feel moist. I feel warm. I'm into being together. The final word circles back to the beginning of the poem creating a tight unity. The simplicity and starkness that hurt elsewhere are the working strengths here. He is not telling us here. He is showing and allowing the reader some flexibility.

In "The Inside Way", a poem of uneven language, choppy rhythm and some rather odd rhymes, a truely powerful ending saves the day.

"wife's word, whispered, melts;
child's word, screeched, shatters.
Some things must melt, should shatter."

The starkness remains but edge is softened by the strangely slow moving alliteration and the intensifying effect of the repitition.

Another poem that works is "Haiku:Collaboration".

"Lonliness of pain,
Trembling despair quieted
By a baby's cry."

A good Haiku always reminds me that they sound like an oriental answer to the sonnet. Fischer's sonnet is called "The Spoilers". It fulfills the requirements of a difficult form well and that's always impressive. This one is a conscious protest of air pollution. The language is reasonably exciting and it moves the way you would expect a good sonnet to move. If you agree with the premise, you will like the poem. I do and I do.

"After Night-Running" is Fischer's best poem. It's different in language, in fact the whole feel is new. As Fischer dives headlong into a lush use of the language one fears he will overdo it. But though he pushes the tactic to its limits, he never goes over the line. At critical points he slows down long enough for you to catch your breathe and then plunges forward leading us through a complex landscape of emotional imagery. And this poem is true to its own rules; its own

Davis Supports Poetry Lecture

Mr. Editor,

One way or another I seem to have taken up an inordinate amount of your limited space recently, and now this letter is threatening to run on a bit, but I thought maybe if I promised not to say another word this year, regardless of the provocation, perhaps you might run it.

In the past two or three years debate outside of classes over intellectual and aesthetic issues has been so rare at Juniata that one hesitates to do other than applaud its sprouting, however badly one might feel one's own ideas get used in the process. It is comforting to find that even in these gray days one can still say something to rouse an occasional student not merely to interest but to genuine warmth.

One could, I suppose, have wished for a higher proportion of light to heat in Jim McDonald's recent remarks on my poetical soiree, but as I've already implied, I think we've all got to huff on whatever coals we find around here and not be grousing about tthier luminosity.

Still, since his comments may have been confusing for readers who weren't at the talk, and must certainly have been for those who were, I thought I might risk a clarification or two.

Jim seemed to have three major objections to my remarks: (1) I am not sufficiently devoted to contemporary poetry to comment knowledgeably on it; (2) my talk was disorganized; (3)—and this was more implied than stated directly—there was a pervading nastiness about the evening: a hostility to poetry in general and to young poets and their work in particular.

In turning to the first of these points I might do well to remind readers that I am the one arguing that the art of poetry is presently in a very bad way. It's important that everyone fix his mind on this, because even though Jim makes it clear that he is willing to argue the opposite position, he has a way of making his points with such admirable vigor that it's easy to overlook the fact that some of them ought to be scored to my side of the sheet.

He lists, for instance, a handful of little magazines which publish contemporary poetry—Dust and Abroxas are two of the titles I can remember—and suggests that I probably don't read them regularly. Well, he's dead right about that, and I will further admit that I have never even heard of most of them, and suspect that a shade over 99% of the U. S. populace finds itself in the same state of ignorance. But is that a point for Jim's argument or for mine?

In the same vein, he later lists ten modern poets and "wonders if" I have heard of them. This is not an argument, of course, but it has the look of a very cunning trap, and had best be approached warily. The temptation, clearly, is to read into the question an inference that I haven't read these poets, and to rush to the defense of my sophistication, bristling and snarling "Like hell I haven't." The folly of such a course is obvious. Just when I had worked myself into a stratospheric dudgeon, Jim leap out from behind a copy of Abroxas and cry "AHA! So you do read modern poetry," in which case I would look very sheepish indeed and it could very well be point, set and mattch to McDonald.

There is possibility, on the other hand, that I am being overly cautious. Perhaps Jim wondered his wonderings in all innocence. I confess that the thought had not occurred to me that my audience would expect a reference to every contemporary poet I have ever read, and that they might conclude that I hadn't heard of all those not mentioned. Catering to this sort of expectation would have made for a longer talk than I felt justified in giving, though I suppose it would have gone a long way toward eliminating the theatricality Jim found so bothersome.

To be honest, I will admit that I have read all but one of the poets Jim names, that I have been read to by three of the bunch, and that one of them, Mr. Snodgrass, once spilled the better part of a Tanqueray martini on my thigh. This was back during my undergraduate days, before the brand was at all fashionable, and the incident made a greater impression on me than anything I have read of Mr. Snodgrass's since Heart's Needle.

Moving on to Jim's complaint about the apparent randomness of my remarks, I'll make a half concession. If he didn't discern any pattern, one possibility has to be that there was none. I thought there was, though it was not a rigid organization, and certainly made no pretense, as J. pointed out with some crossness, of scholarly rigor. I suppose that finally Jim and I differ over the degree of tightness appropriate for an oral presentation, as honest men might differ over any point of taste. I know though ,that if I cared as much about organization as Jim I'd make it a point to arrive at lectures a lot closer to their beginnings than Jim does. I've noticed that sometimes valuable clues to the structure of a talk are dispensed in the first ten or fifteen minutes.

Also, since I've brought up openings, I might as well add that they have also been known to contain information about the relation of the title to the topic, as, in fact, mine did. Several people who were there have pointed out to me that what Jim said that I had to say about Kvasir was a flat-out misrepresentation. I have done what I could to calm them, arguing that Jim is nowhere near as guilty as he would have been had he actually heard my comments, and then had misrepresented them. Still, if Jim had been able to look in a little earlier, it probably would have done a good bit in the way says that "in the classroom you learn theories, but in the community you learn which theories are true, and which are applicable."

Each college is responsible for developing itts own way of monitoring the activities of volunteers. Usually, the students report to faculty advisers, and, in addition, they may write reports and attend seminars.

Jerry Brady, who heads University Year for ACTION for the Government, said in a recent interview that "a principle problem for the program has been getting colleges and universities to design into the projects learning structures that are acceptable to the faculty and administration."

An alloted number of volunteers from many major fields are selected by each school, usually by interviewing all interested candidates, and trying to determine their degree of commitment to aid the poor.

ACTION provides a monthly stipend of between $200 and $300 to each volunteer, depending on geographic location, from its budget of $8.5 million. Volunteers are supposed to move in to the area in which their project operates, using their stipend to pay living expenses.

Some institutions have used the program as a vehicle to attract minority students. Nationally, 43 per cent of the volunteers are black, Hispanic, Oriental, or American Indian.

In Washington, the names of 30 more institutions that are to be added to the program were announced this month. Included on the list from the metropolitan area were nine units of the City University and Princeton University. which are to name 46 volunteers among them.

The students here will spend a year in a project sponsored by the city's Urban Corps screening high school students in mobile health clincs for venereal disease, sickle cell anemia, and other diseases.

his telescope as she got on the bus every day and he even bought her exotic foods from the United Nations Gormet Shop which cost 22 dollars and which she promptly returned.

Norman was persistent and he continued to pursue her until she lost her job at the YWCA on the grounds that they were getting sick of a mad man disturbing the place. Andy decided to give her a secretary's job, although she couldn't type or file. She was to cook, clean, and just be nice to Norman. Norman still tried to be helpful to Sophie. The last straw was when he tried to help her with a vacuum cleaner and in the process bit her ear. He decided that after all the nice things he tried to do, she still hated him, then he wouldn't like her anymore.

However, Andy now became enchanted by her smell, and Sophie found that although he repulsed her, she was terribly attracted to him. Norman walked into find Sophie in the arms of his now ex-friend. He decided to fight Andy and leave, but found himself chained to a heating pipe.

The end appeared as if the three would go their own ways, but everyone returned and the scene closed with the happy atmosphere of the three together once again with Sophie dusting and singing patriotically.

I felt the play was a good one and the performers did a fabulous job, adding up to an entertaining evening filled with laughter for those who got a chance to see it.

limits. The poem opens with the following lines.

"Apache-sprawled with ear to wintersteel rail-hum
I tympan-feel the pulse of iron-wheel hoofbeats, and, engine still for off, roll (head still on rail) to sudden face nightsky's thousand-star thrillglow, and turn, direction-dazed, seeking polestar solidness—

And then after weaving the perfect web he ends with these lines.

"And it was only a bear-story I had forgotten, a dipper misplaced, and, rising from rail-bed, I am not lost."

"For Sue (Sue is Doug's wife.) is, finally, not as successful as "After night-Running". But it is a later poem (By about a month) and it shows the direction Fischer work will (Hopefully) take. This poem seems to me a fusion of the lush driving power of "After Night-Running" and the stark beauty of, for instance, the ending of "The Inside Way". The last four lines of "For Sue" should serve as an adequate example.

"So feeling the breathe of each carving met,
Tasting joy in each lungful we may,
And trusting the pulse of each
wind that rolls,
We'll dance, air-statue, dance into clay."

Stauffer Is Named VP of Commission

by Robert Lopresti

The president of Juniata College, John N. Stauffer was elected vice president of the Commission for Independene Colleges and Universities, at a recent meeting of the association in Harrisburg.

The Commission is composed of 80 independent colleges and universities. This includes almost all such institutions in Pennsylvania.

Dr. Stauffer explained the purposes of the Commission. "It is imperative for the nation that the independence of the more than 1200 private colleges and universities be maintained. Especially important is the need for independent colleges and universities to work together to obtain needed government support under conditions which are the uniquely valuable elements of colleges and universities in the private sectors."

Dr. Stauffer has been a member of the Commission's executive committee since 1970 and the secretary-treasurer this year. Next year's chairman is Dr. Edward D. Eddy, President of Chatham College in Pittsburgh.

J.C. Baseball Team In ICAC Tournament

by Gary Gillen

The Indian baseball squad ended its regular season on a winning note with a 4-2 rain shortened victory over Gettysburg. The victory wrapped up an 11-6 season, the winningest season in Juniata history. The victory also enabled the Indians to gain an ICAC tournament bid. Juniata was also seated number one. The ICAC tournament begins this Friday at F&M where Juniata will meet Scranton.

Davis Poetry—

of dispelling some people's unfortunate impression that he came into the thing with a chapped butt, a clenched head and an unshakeable notion of what a lecture with a title like mine would probably have to say about college literary magazines.

The gravest charge Jim tossed at me was that of general negativity. "He was careful to say nothing positive," he says at one point, and he seems to have come away with the impression that I am gleeful to find Dame Poetry laid low and that I spent an evening dancing on her grave. Not so. Only someone who cares about something deeply is likely to publicly mourn its passing, and I'm sorry if even one person left the hall thinking I am down on poetry. I thought I had even contrived to end on an optimistic note about the art's future.

Jim also asserts that I was unfair, if not downright hostile, to Kvasir, and that my talk "will undoubtedly make it more difficult to get the necessary funding" for the magazine. He ends this paragraph, lower lip thrust forward, with the porphecy that I am likely to be unmoved by the havoc I may have wrought. What can I say to change the mind of a man who feels this way even after hearing most of my talk? I honestly was not out to get Kvasir. When I devised my title (and I repeat that title is the only section of my lecture that could be construed as an attack), the thought even flitted through my head that perhaps I could raise interest in the publication.,

Let me give Jim this earnest of my sincerity. Should there be funding problems next year, I promise to hike my patronage contribution twenty-fold—no small gesture for a man on my salary. I can't resist pointing out though, that in times of great interest in poetry, college literary magazines have not needed to appeal to administrations and committees for funds; they have paid their own way.

VOL. XLVIV NO. 22 | Juniata College — Huntingdon, Pa. 16652 | MAY 23, 1973

Student Gov't Planning For The Year Ahead

by Pat Minnick

Juniata's Student Government is in the process of getting prepared for academic year '73-74 with plans being made for the Fall Leadership Conference to be held at Camp Blue Diamond. The conference, which is for small private colleges, will cover the topics of campus judiciaries, our Student Government is interested in the operations of other colleges in judiciary matters), student legal rights, and of course, academic affairs.

Student Government President Dave Baer promises that work will continue during '73-74 on course evaluations. (The product of this years evaluation, the yellow book complete with caricatures of professors, has been on sale for $.50 in the lobby of Ellis.) Baer projects that a supplementary evaluation booklet will be published next year, with a complete book coming out in '74-75.

A new Dormitory Government will come into operation next year, being a small body composed of one representative from each hall on campus, which is a change from the past where there was a seperate body for men, and one for women. Also pending ratification of Student Affairs Council at a special session this coming Thursday, a new Judicial Board will be created. This will be the sole campus judiciary concerning violations of the rules and regulations of the campus (see Letters to the Editor and Editorial).

A college government related project of a state-wide scale may receive some attention next year. An attempt is being made by former Student Government President Dave Andrews to work toward the formation of a Pennsylvania small private college lobby. The last organization for this type disbanded two years ago, yet the need for representation on a state-wide level of students from this type of college has not diminished.

In '73-74 Juniata Student Government will continue to work through National Student Lobby and take stands on issues of national importance. Student Services (health and food, for example) will continue to be looked into by Student Government. Faculty-student relations which seem to be lacking in non-academic areas also may receive some Student Government attention.

Moliere's Plays Discussed In French Lecture

by Dave MacVeigh

Last Thursday night, Shoemaker Galleries was the scene of a lecture entitled "Moliere in an English Garb," presented by Dr. Hugh H. Chapman, Jr., professor of Romance languages at Penn State. The French Club sponsored the talk about the great French comedian of the 17th century.

Chapman traced in great detail English translations of Moliere's works beginning in 1704 to the present. He noted that most of the translations were very loose translations, and that, in many cases, speeches were added or deleted. The humor, for which Moliere is noted, was baudier in the translations than in the original French.

In 1739, Moliere's complete works were translated. From 1771 to 1875, there was a waning interest in the playwright, except to attack him occasionally on the grounds that he wasn't as good a writer as Shakespeare because he didn't write tragedies, which, in Chapman's opinion, is a ridiculous argument. Also, the English critics considered Moliere's language "too coarse."

Two modern translations of eight and three of Moliere's plays have

Some Made It - Some Didn't

by Sue Blum

Juniata's 1973 Raft Race began at around one o'clock last Saturday afternoon. There were twenty-four rafts all together at the beginning of the race. The Smithfield bridge was the site of the starting point and the ending point, to which only a large select made it, was down across from Top's Diner.

As my eyes scanned the river they caught sight of some very interesting situations and structures. One of the rafts made in front of Cloister Arch was gigantic. It was boarded with an outhouse, sofa and about twenty-five people. The big barge sunk but its treasures were saved (the kegs). Another raft which attracted my eyes resembled the old steam boats, only its power came from a bicycle hitched up to a rubber conveyor belt. The conveyor belt turned paddle wheels in the water. Its construction was quite original. Next I saw six guys dressed in bathrobes in a raft constructed similar to a bathtub. There was a bar of ivory soap taging behind the white work of art and large foam pads carried it rapidly along the water.

Some of the rafts from last year were back for a second try I heard. The canoe-like fiberglass structure with pontoons headed by Tim English and a saucer type bowl headed by Lidian Pow could be seen again. As for the rest of the canoes I could go pages on end describing them. Mostly males entered the race. But two rafts headed by girls caught my eye as they came into finish, although they did not place among the winners. The two rafts were headed by Cindy Sleeth and Nancy Agnew. Both these rafts used inner tubes for their means of floatation.

The canoes carried the judges for the race. The judging was based on theme, construction and of course the fastest speed. Raft number 1 headed by Bill DeMuth was second into finish. The rafts theme was excellent though and that put it into first place to win the $100. This raft was a Rub A Dub Dub six men in a tub. Second place was given to Tim English and his crew. They were no. 7 and first into the finish. Third and Fourth place was a tie. The winners were no. 2 and no. 8. No. 2 raft captained by Owen Thompson was forth into finish but it had the best over all theme. No. 8 raft was headed by Walt Prozialeck. Their raft was 3rd into finish and one of the most carefully constructed. It was the Blue Space Lab. Fifth place went to Ron Walters and his crew who got all their points on their theme. They were no. 22 and they won $10.

The raft regatta was certainly exciting for the spectators and tiring but fun for the captains and their mates who set sail on the deep muddy waters of Juniata on the day of May 19th in the year 1973.

"The Barge" one of the rafts in last Saturday's Raft Regatta appears to be experiencing some difficulty.

Grant Given For Humanities Reference Material Library

Juniata College has received an additional grant of $87,500 from the National Endowment for the Humanities. The grant, which supplements a major humanities grant awarded to Juniata College in June, 1972, is subject to the receipt of matching funds by the N.E.H. The total of the grant and the matching funds will be $87,500.

The N.E.H. library grant will provide relevant materials for Juniata to develop new education courses as well as to help support existing courses. The funds will provide books, reference materials, perioicals, duplicate materials, a slide collection for art; development of a basic library in the foundation of language to assist in English; materials in black and urban history; tapes original language literary works and cultural materials for foreign language study; tapes for music; new accessions and tapes in religion.

The social and physical sciences will also be taken into consideration with new acquistion of periodicals and reference works which deal with historical and philosophical problems in science.

Juniata became eligible for this supplemental grant because of the previous N.E.H. grant. This gift gives direct assistance for the resources to support the programs developed by the college and instituted in the fall of 1971.

JUDICIAL BOARD

An organization has been formed to reorganize the judiciary process at J.C. Maybe now we will be judged by those who know us best, our fellow students.

Before the committee was formed, original plans for next year called for both a Judiciary Board and a Disciplinary Board. The Disciplinary Board included the Dean of Students, two faculty members and two students. While the non-student members of the board totaled a slight majority, their influence over board hearings approached 100%.

The Judiciary Board, is composed entirely of students. Guilt or innocence is decided by those students. Punishment is set by those students. It sounds great.

But what cases do these two boards have control over. Major cases, an arbitrary area decided by the Dean of Students, go to the Disciplinary Board. Most minor cases are taken care of by the R.A. This past year, Men's houses and Women's houses, the forerunners of the judicial board, had no cases. Why have a Judicial Board? It is a good selling point at any college to say that students are responsible for discipline and are doing a good job of it. It is very easy to tell prospective students that THE Judicial Board is composed entirely of students. We wonder how many people will come here under that mistaken impression that Judicial Board is the primary organization responsible for disciplining students.

But now a committee has been formed to change all this. As newly elected members of the Judicial Board we have several recommendations for this committee:

(1) One disciplinary board should be set up which will handle all disciplinary cases. This would insure equal treatment for all cases. This board should consist of students, and if faculty and administration are considered necessary then students should be in the majority.

(2) Students, instead of the dean, should decide what cases should appear before whatever boards are set up.

(3) Members of any board should get their positions through election. We feel this would eliminate someone being asked to fill the position who really is not interested. It would open the door for the person who would be sincere and active as a member. Also, as experienced in the judiciary board election, an election would give a much better cross section of the studentts at J.C. than having people appointed by one person or one group.

(4) None of the students elected to Judicial Board for next year are on the judicial revision committee. We have shown our interest by running for office. By electing us, the student body has shown its faith in our ideas. We feel that we should be included at meetings of the judicial revisions committee.

We the undersigned agree that the present judiciary system is seriously lacking. We feel that students should have more power in the judiciary process at J.C. As newly elected members to the judiciary board, we would accept the elimination of this board and our positions on it if the changes proposed will improve the judicial system. If no revisions are made and the Judicial Board remains as a disciplinary unit in name and not in function, then we will resign. We ran for positions on the Judicial Board in the belief that students were capable of disciplining themselves. We hold to this idea.

IN DEFENSE OF STUDENTS

This letter is in reply to the letter to the Editor by John Knouse in last week's issue. The entire tone of the letter was incredible. It sounded as if Mr. Knouse had just written it to show that he was capable of throwing a temper tantrum, I do not enjoy being called a "pig", a "nice kiddy" or a "clean ass". I am not a prude, and if he wishes to use this language, he may —but not in the school newspaper where it's insulting to students or faculty.

EDITORIAL

by Henry Siedzikowski

In this article of the Juniatian, a letter appears, written by newly elected members of Judicial Board. This letter raised some questions, and makes some suggestions that all the students here at Juniata College should be interested in.

As a member of the ad hoc committee studying judicial revision on this campus, I felt it was important that these questions not be left hanging over the summer. Therefore, I would like to try and point out what the judicial revision committee is doing now, and at the same time answer these questions.

Before proceding, however, I would like to make one thing clear. The judicial revision committee is simply an advisory committee. The Student Affairs Council will have to make the ultimate decision on this matter. At this point, the judicial revision committee is in the process of writing a final document. This document will be finalized by the committee on Wednesday, and then go to SAC for approval on Thursday. Therefore, anything I say here will be tenative, and must be accepted as such. However, it is hoped, that for the most part these will be the provisions of next years judicial structure.

The first question raised in the letter of jurisdiction. They make an interesting, and quite correct point, that the areas of jurisdiction at Juniata are vague. This was a point which has concerned the judicial revision committee from the beginning. That has been a problem as long as we have had the present judicial structure.

As I have said, the committee was concerned about this, and they have tried to deal with it. The proposal for the new structure contains only one judicial board. All cases would be under its jurisdiction. The only time a case would not go to them, would be when a student chose to have an administrative hearing. I cannot stress too much, that all of this is tenative, but I think this area is one of the most likely to be approved.

The next point made in the letter concerns the structure of any judicial board. Their suggestion was that if it could not be composed entirely of students, than the students should at least have a majority. When the judicial revision committee discussed this aspect, it decided that it was essential to have members of the faculty and administration on any board. The reasoning behind this is that we are a college community, composed of students, faculty and administrators. It is not supposed to be just desperate students caught up in a never ending struggle against an openly hostile administration and faculty. If the latter were the case, I would be the first to agree, that only students should be able to judge students. However, if the former is the case, as I believe it is, than I think a faculty member or an administrator could make useful input into the structure.

I must point out here, that I wholeheartedly agree that students should be in the majority on any such board. The structure that is most likely to be proposed, will have a judicial board composed of four students, two faculty members, and one administrator. Although, this is not for certain, it seems to be the most likely to be approved, at least by the judicial revision committee.

Their next suggestion was that students, not the dean, have the right to decide, what cases will go before the judicial board. As I stated before, the committee was unanimous in deciding that the

by Steve Townsend

I had been cruising at the usual rate of 75 mph up some straight stretch of country highway. The radio was blaring one of those toe tapping, deep Philly soul numbers, which carried just enough energy to set my foot thumping on the accelerator pedal. Suddenly, as I pulled out of a slight curve, my speaker began to spit out this strange, circus like sound. Before I could reach for the tuner knob, all thoughts of a reception problem were erased by an incredibly clear and infectious beat. Four minutes later my speedometer needle was well past the century mark, and holy hell, my high beams had uncovered the distinct red glow of a stop sign! When I finally came to a halt 150 yards into a corn field, Wolfman Jack tells me I had nearly been killed by Elton John's new single "Crocodile Rock!"

By the time I had settled with the insurance agent, the song that had propelled me on that insane rock and roll flight was sitting triumphantly atop every sales chart in the nation. Its just released sister album, "Don't Shoot Me I'm Only The Piano Player," was launching a similar assault upon the LP listings. As a celebration to my penning of the settlement, a close friend and I eased into an evening with a bottle of vodka and Elton's new record. Within an hour it became very clear that "Don't Shoot Me" was fused with all the freshness and teenage energy that had characterized "Crocodile Rock" so distinctively.

After the failure of "Madman Across the Water", Elton realized it was about time to adjust the course of his career. "Honky Chateau" was that adjustment. The continuously bothersome, overly lavish production was quickly eliminated. Taupin's incomprehensible lyrics were held in check. In short, "Honky Chateau" was the delightful groundwork that "Don't Shoot Me" rests upon beautifully. The complete success of John's new album can be attributed to tthese two facts.

Most importantly, Gus Dudgeon must be given credit for learning how to produce Elton John. The fine line between a well produced record and a totally confused product has been drawn. "Daniel", the albums first number and probably one of the finest tunes John has written to date, is the epitome of Dudgeon's new work. The song could have easily been polluted with a wall of background strings, but instead, a haunting synthesizer tenderly carries its melody. "Elderberry Wine", and "Midnight Creeper" on the other hand, are not the product of production restraint, but ratther the result of a kind of musical punctuation. Low register brass arrangements dot both numbers, driving them beyond possibilities of their basic structures.

Secondly, Bernie Taupin has set down a set of lyrics that John feels at home with. Gone are the days when Elton stylishly strung syllables together, he is now clearly out front. One can just feel him "hunker" down to the verses of "Teacher I Need You." "She was long and she was lean/she's a middle age dream." The subject of Taupins lyrics are now discernable to everyone who was ever a teenager, which is no small matter. How many records can boast well performed, melodious, numbers in the vein of "Blues for My Baby and Me'", "Texan Love Song", and "I'm Going to be a Teenage Idol"?

All the credit, however, can not be given to Dudgeon and Taupin, in the final analysis it had to be Elton John that gave the orders. Only he could tell Taupin that he wanted a rock album, or have Dudgeon hold back on the orchestration. It had to be John himself that guided the frame-work for his most lively performance yet. "Don't Shoot Me I'm Only the Piano Player" will certainly become one of Elton John's finer moments.

Lime

by Edward Kinchley Evans

If with the waning of the moon you start growing hair on your hands and your eyes light up with a fever of the mind as the disturbing question pops into your head, "what on earth am I doing here?", you are in the process of taking the first baby steps towards maturity which is simply thinking for yourself, out of ever present predicaments.

I would venture the probability that you are in college because your parents have insisted on this adventure. They, being children of parents who survived the Great Depression of the 30's, were schooled in the practicality that the individual with the most education was the one who was employed. And employment meant food and clothing and shelter. An educated man was one who could think his way more constructively out of distress and during those times it was a daily necessity. With the Second World War, the educated man was an officer; the uneducated was, as a general rule, fodder and soil sweetner. So, you are here, learning to think.

Now, putting this into work, on a universal level, that is, taking it out of the context of books, which are tools of learning the process, let's turn our thoughts to the theatre of the political circus which involves your present and future. We are harvesting the fruit of the "Watergate" mess. Using the thought process, what signs were given to us that should have forewarned us of this inevitability? Didn't McGovern shut up shop too quickly and for no apparent reason? After the election didn't it seem that nothing was being done about Vietnam until the "Watergate" condition surfaced and then overnight the war as such, ended. Would it have been practical to have it at the same time as Watergate? If it ended so suddenly for such a sordid reason, wherein lies all the torment of those who were there in Vietnam and their sacrifice? You may not have been too old at the time but when Johnson was in power and the Vietnamese war was young, every time there was a peace demonstration, he accelerated the War. When he made the gesture of saying he would go to Hawaii and negotiate peace, Martin Luther King was assasinated and the trip was cancelled. So much for political curiosities.

We've been having a lot of rain lately. Have you noticed? When you start thinking for yourself and it is a bit different from those around you, don't be too surprised at becoming somewhat isolated. This rain business has bothered me for several years. I wasn't at all enthused about the government's space program and could have cared less about getting to the Moon. They haven't done too good a publicity job on what good it all adds up too. However, it seems to me that after every space shot, we have several weeks of rainy weather. However, when this idea is forwarded, people raise eyebrows and question one's sanity. But, seeing as how rain has caused a lot of discomfiture lately, shouldn't we at least explore the why of it, and if it is caused by the space shots, why has the government not enlightened the public?

Now, about that hair on your hands. . . . . .

accused student should always have the right to have his case heard by the judicial board. I might add here, that of all the points I am including in this article, this is the one point that I am most sure will appear in the new judiciary structure, when it is finally approved.

Their next point was that the student members of the new judicial board should be elected, not appointed. At this point in time, I can not say for certain which method of choosing student members will be finally agreed apon. However, I will argue for the appointment method. There are several reasons for this. Probably the main one is that student elections here at our beloved JC have a strange tendency to turn into popularity contests. I would argue that a high degree of popularity does not necessarily qualify one to be a member of a judiciary board. I don't believe it will be in the student's best interest, to have people sitting in judgement of them who are only there because they needed a little extra something on their record for graduate school.

The second argument I have against the election method is a bit more philosophical and theoretical. What we were striving for on the judicial revision committee was to consttruct a judical process that would be more educational than punitive. It was in this line, that we tried to do it with a sense of the campus as a community. If this is indeed our purpose, then I believe it would be contradictory to turn the judicial board into a representative body. I personally believe that the faculty members should be appointed also, but I'm sure that more than a few of them will be after my head for that.

As I have said, this point has not been definitely decided yet. This is just my point of view on the question. I'm sure there are many others. However, one thing I will point out, is that if it is a system of appointment by the president of student government, there will be bylaws written in, requiring interviews of all the candidates, so that it is not a one man show.

Their final point is that none of the students recently elected to judicial board was on the judicial revision committee. There were reasons for this. The main one is that the committee was formed before the elections for judicial board were held. The committee was set up with five students, two faculty members, and two administrators. Members of last years Disciplinary Board were included on this committee, so as to involve studentts who were familiar with the judicial structure at the college. Since all of the students elected to judicial board were new to the process, five of the six were freshmen, it might even be argued, that, for the most part, they had less experience than the student members of the judicial revision committee that were appointed to it.

In conclusion, I would like to point out that I am not attacking this letter in any way. In fact, except for the point about elections of members, I agree with it wholeheartedly. I have attempted, though, to inform the students what is going on in this situation. I was concerned that leaving questions such as these left unanswered over the summer could have grave consequences.

This is the last issue of the Juniatian to appear this year. As editor, I would like to speak for the staff in wishing this years seniors luck as they graduate and go out into the world, and also, we express the hope that the entire college community has an enjoyable summer, and we all return to make next year a successful one.

Letter to Editor Food Service—

I can sympathize with him on some of his criticisms. I, too, have worked in the dishroom, and, believe me, it's no picnic. But, I must disagree on some points Mr. Knouse makes. The dishwasher should be able to clean off the food from the dishes—but it isn't. And what is more disgusting than any of the dirty trays, dishes, or utensils going into the kitchen is the number of dirty ones coming out of the kitchen. Any cafeteria or restaurant that can tolerate dirty silverware, etc. should lose its license, for it is a potential health hazard. If Mr. Knouse does not want to "take the time to pull napkins, etc. out of glasses", my suggestion is that he quit his job.

The most serious criticism I have of Mr. Knouse, however, does not effect the cafeteria—or only indirectly. What I object to is a recurring paranoid attitude of people, usually limited to, legislators, but not restricted to them, I'll get to the point. Where does Mr. Knouse get the nerve to preach his morality to us? If some students want to smoke cigarettes, then why is he telling us not to? Does he think he is a king, and can dictate what we should do? And if he has no right to tell us not to smoke, it follows that he has no right to tell us where we can not smoke. Until (or unless) the cafeteria puts up "no smoking signs, it is every person's right to smoke. I don't smoke and I agree with Mr. Knouse that cigaretts are unhealthy and that smoking is a bad habit. But I pride myself on not preaching my morality to anyone. How would Mr. Knouse feel if I told him what church to go to? I'm sure he would feel that it was none of my business.

The Student Government is currently working on ways of improving the Food Service. I am sure that it will be receptive to all reasonable criticisms. But I am confident that it will (for the most part) overlook Mr. Knouse's letter as being the ravings of a spoiled child.

B-ball Tourney Ends On Losing Note For J.C.

by Dave Judd

Juniata's baseball season ended on a losing note in the ECAC playoffs Friday May 18th. The tribe went down to defeat at the hands of Delaware Valley in the first round of the tournament. The final score was 7-2.

The Indians jumped out in front when they scored a run in the bottom of the first, but they were soon to be victimized once again by some of their own shoddy play, giving Delaware Valley 4 unearned runs. With a five run lead Bob Polinsky, the Delaware Valley pitcher, could afford to split the plate with his fastball and not worry about cutting corners for strikes. The fact that Polinsky had something on the ball could be attested to the fact that he struck out 17 Juniata batters and only gave up 3 hits.

Mark Amatucci was the losing pitcher but when the opposition scores 4 runs on a single the pitcher can't shoulder all of the blame.

The Indians record of 11 and 6 (11-7 after the ECAC defeat) tied an all time Juniata win record that was set back in the 30's. The baseball squad will lose only 3 seniors by graduation. Two positions will be vacated for next season but with the team experiencing tournament play this year, next year's squad promises to be better. Coach Berrier's squad of 74 should capture more victories than ever before.

Spring Playoffs End For Intramurals

by Vernne L. Wetzel

The softball league playoffs of this week mark the end of the intramural tournaments for the year. The only other IM event is the All College Invitational Track meet that had to be postponed until tomorrow evening. Unfortunately, all of these events take place after the last deadline for the "Juniatian."

The action last week consisted almost exclusively of softball games. There were 6 games last Monday to wrap up the regular season for flight one. The results of those games were Vice Squad 11—Longshots 9 (Frank Pote led the Squads with 4 hits, and Pat Fleagle had 2 hits and Bob Giese had a homer for the Longshots); Country Joel and the Fish 11—Henchmen 8 (Joel Shaffer, Milt Knouse, Chuck Barr, and John Andoniades had 2 hits each and Milt and Walt Prozialek had homers for the Fish, and Jake Culler, Henry Marburger, and Cliff Elder had 2 hits and Henry hit a homer for the Henchmen O' Henry); King's Men 2—Mainliners 1 (Tom Herrman led King's Men with 2 hits, and no record was dipt for Mainliners.) Coyotes II 12—Bear and His Court 9 (Tom Knackstedt lead Coyotes with 2 hits and Dennis Little and Pete Lentini had a homer each and for the Court. Jeff Laudenslager and Gary Martman each had 2 hits, each had one homer, and Rick Phalunas had 2 homers): Greased Lightening 5—North Umqua River 2 (Mike MacLenzie had 4 hits and Mark Jenkins hit a homer for Greased Lightening, and Jim Pye and Doug McIlwain each had a hit for the River—Doug had a homer: and Thunder Alley Kats 22—Master Batters 9 (Jim Bowen led the Kats with 5 hits and Bill Thompson, Mark Stafford and Jim each had a homer, there was no record for the Batters). The league standings at the end of the season showed a four-way tie for 1st place. Those 4 teams are in the playoffs. Those standings were:

Henchmen	6	3
Mainliners	6	3
Vice Squad	6	3
Coyotes II	6	3
King's Men	6	2
Bear & His Court	5	4
Longshots	4	5
Tunder Alley Kats	4	5
North Umqua River Softball Club	3	5
Greased Lightning	3	6
Country Joel & the Fish	3	6
Master Batters	1	8

Flight two ended the regular season on Tuesday with 5 scheduled games. The Raggerz' game with the Roaches was cancelled, and Northwest Passage won over Winners IV by forfeit. The scores of the three remaining games were N. J. House 5—Coole: Bucs 9—Faculty 0; and Ant Hill Mob 9—Stan & Pete's 8 (no records of hits were kept). The top 4 teams in the final standings went to the playoffs. The standings were:

Ant Hill Mob	5	0
N.J. House	5	1
Northwest Passage	4	2
Bucs	3	2
Stan & Pete's	2	2
Raggerz	2	3
Winners IV	2	4
Cisco's Kids	1	3
Faculty	0	5

There is a correction to be made in the team standings for the women's softball league that was printed in the last issue. Due to a technicality, Coder's Clodders forfeited to the Spring Terrors, so the Spring Terrors' record was 6-0 and Coder's Clodders' record was 3-1. Last week there were 6 games. On Monday, the scores were Abecedarians 21—J.A.'s 12 (Cathy Dickey and Mary Ann Repman led the Abecedarians with 6 hits each, and Pat Adams led the J.A.'s with 5 hits), and Today 17—Spacers 1 (Cherie Dettmar and Carol Garzillo led Today with 6 hits each, and Ginny Harris, Deb Grasty, and Tracy Kielblock each had a hit for the Spacers). On Tuesday there were 2 more games. The results were Terry's Terrible Teddy Bears 12—Howdidodats 8 (Phyllis Feltenberger, Janice Hadley, and Janie Dillen led the Bears with 3 hits, and Ellen Valentine led Howdidodats with 3 hits), and Coder's Clodders 15— 3 S.S. 11 (Cindy Gilbert, Barb Kosik and Johnette Keiser each had 4 hits for the Clodders, and Sue Hitchner, Nancy Mowry, Susan Keeler, and Nanci Reber led 3 S.S. with 2 hits each). On Wednesday there were 2 games, one score was available—Today 9—Abecedarians 5. The top 4 teams went to the playoffs. The final league standings were:

Spring Terrors	7	0
Today	6	0
Abecedarians	5	2
Coder's Clodders	3	4
Howdidodats	2	3
J.A.'s	2	6
Spacers	1	4
3 S.S.	1	4
Terry's Terrible Teddy Bears	1	5

The final tennis and badminton ladder standings were not available for this issue.

I'd like to take a few lines here to thank Dean Rossi and Dick Reilly and their staff for their help in compiling and organizing the intramural reports. For those of us who will be here next year, I think we can expect another enjoyable year filled with a variety of intramural activities.

Dr. Stauffer said of Oswald, "Dr. Oswald is an outstanding educational leader whose influences reach throughout the land; far beyond the great universities he has served. His neighborly concern has nurtured the quality and diversity of teaching, research and service that our national interest requires."

Other highlights in the busy weekend will be the fiftieth anniversary of the graduation of the class of 1923, various other reunion dinners for other classes including the emeriti classes prior to 1923.

In charge of all the commencement proceedings is Dr. Earl C. Kaylor, General Chairman of the Commencement Committee.

A Focus On New Students At Juniata

Comments and girls panties fly during last weeks panty raids.

ife on Campus - A Series f Mischevious Mishaps

by David Mitchell

Well it's that time of year again. mpus life has begun anew for shmen and upperclassmen alike, everyone begins the '73-'74 aca- mic year. Freshmen have to make e most adaptations as they find emselves switching over from the ggish pace of high school to the re rapid strides of the college ademic scene. The biggest adjust- nt for the frosh is getting into groove of campus life.

Living on campus can really be blast as many of the freshmen ve already found out. Sure, some- nes it may seem a little dull, but mpus life, like anything else, has ups and downs. Thanks to the rk of a few students, entertain- ent in the form of movies and e entertainment have been pro- ded for the student body's en- yment. Other little spicey items ve popped up now and then to ighten up life on campus. Three eks ago, the annual Storming of e Arch was celebrated at Cloister. one happened to be passing rough the area at the time, he ight have seen an occasional shmen getting his skull fractured ainst the stone pavement while was being soaked with water. reat way to pass the time, isn't it? One of the spiciest items thrown to campus life was the panty id which occurred last Wednes- ay night. Most male students will nd to agree (female students too) hat last Wednesday was a real reamy" affair. Even though there eren't very many panties taken, he guys had quite a time giving the mpus co-eds the once over with having cream. Screaming females could be heard until after midnight on campus as they tried to defend their dorms from the "invaders." Fallout from the raid could be seen on the campus greens the following morning. Another result which wasn't so obvious took place at the campus bookstore. For some reason or other, sales of shaving cream containers increased sharply.

Frosh Initiated To Writing

by Janet Milburn

With the steady flow of incoming Freshmen, the Freshmen Writing Program is beginning its third year with some minor changes in its itinerary, but still the same basic idea.

The Program is still to teach the student to communicate clearly and express his ideas fully, but with emphasis on perception. Each student is required to keep a journal, as they did last year, but for ten weeks only. They are to record any striking emotions, actions, thoughts, or feelings for the day, but not as a diary. The idea behind this activity is to give daily practice in writing, but the problem is, why write if you've nothing inspiring to write about that day? The course will end up with a term paper, as was assigned last year.

There will be no exemptions during the year for the present Freshmen, but during the past summer they were required to take Seminars Bring Optimism To Frosh In First Days At J.C.

by Gloria Barone

"If you just sit in the dorms and complain to each other, nobody ever hears you that can do anything." So spoke Professor Terry Hartman at freshman workshops this summer in explanation of Freshman Seminar.

"The first idea is to get to know someone on the faculty well," Hartman said. This small group atmosphere in freshman seminar allows the student to feel close to the professor in hopes that the seminar leader will become the student's adviser. If conflicts arise between student and teacher the student can change advisers without confronting him or her at all. Faculty members agrees this is the best advising system Juniata has ever had.

Freshman seminar was born three years ago of a task force of students and faculty evaluating where the curriculum was, and where they wanted it to go. Unlike the other two triplets conceived then, Modes of Thought and Writing Program, Freshman Seminar should theoretically break down the conventional classroom situation. As Professor Hartman said, "All of a sudden he (the seminar leader) wiill be told to go to some room on campus and he will walk in and close the door and nobody told him what to do." Hopefully, professor and students travel together in what they want from the course and how to go about it.

Professor Esther Doyle's seminar, entitled "Word Power" decided to take a field trip to Belleville to observe the cattle auction there. No lesson plan book contained that idea. The class anl instructor went to observe an auctioneer's method of communicating, an example of shared planning among students and professor.

Modes of Thought concerns itself with methodology in logical problem solving. Writing Program then allows students to learn how to communicate what he's discovered once he has solved a problem. And somewhere the thread called Freshman Seminar links the three together. It was designed to afford the opportunnity to research a prolem in a particular field and put Modes and Writing a practical use.

Faculty-student contact rather than content is Freshman Seminar. Many seminar leaders are not teaching in an area they specialize in, but Hartman feels that gives the student a chance to find out how a scholar (supposedly the seminar leader) goes about investigating. "The things you study are rarely the things you end up doing," Hartman explained, so you better know how to begin."

Many freshman seminar topics are foreign to most college campuses, such as "An Introductory View of Bridge" taught by Professor John Bowser." Hartman said of this course, "It is not at all unusual that a mathematician is giving bridge, this is the beginning of

Senator Bayh Speaks On Ills Of The Nation

by Rob Lopresti

On September 21st Senator Birch Bayh (Democrat-Indiana) came to speak on Watergate, more or less.

The Senator appeared to feel, that Watergate is really a symptom of this countries problems, and he was interested on concentrating on the disease. So his speech was mainly concerned with the ways he felt Nixon's administration had been undermining the rights of the Congress and the people.

He emphasized the President's impounding of funds. By a recent law, when congress passes a law Nixon doesn't like he can simply refuse to allow funds for it. Though congress can override his veto, they can't prevent him from in effect, cancelling any act he doesn't approve of, by not financing it. This, contends Bayh, is a violation of the principal of separation of powers.

This was one example of the way he feels Nixon has usurped the powers of congress.

Bayh also discussed events besides Watergate which he thinks show the administrations lack of respect for people's constitutional rights. One was Washington D.C.'s preventative detention law which allows a person to be held for 60 days without bringing them to trial.

Birch Bayh gives speech in Oller Hall.

"If we lose our rights" said the Senator, "we'll lose them a line, a word, a law, an election, at a time."

Although he spoke for a long time on the problems we face, he didn't say much that seemed really new, and he didn't suggest any solutions. He told us how congress's power and the peoples rights were being violated, but no suggestions on how to protect them.

He was an interesting speaker, however, some people complained he didn't always answer the questions that were asked.

Senator Birch Beer is running for reelection in Indiana in 1974.

The person who introduced him suggested that after that, he might be thinking of the presidency in '76. Bayh's only reply was "Too far off to think about".

Storming of the Arch

Dear Juniata Students:

The following observations concerning the recent manifestation of an age old Juniata tradition, were compiled from many jumbled and virtually incoherent notes found on the morning after. Interpretation of these ramblings is left entirely up to the reader, for they are offered as much in the interest of the author's sanity as they are academic contemplation.

* * *

The Schlitz Beer clock had wandered past 9:30 by only a few minutes. It was beginning to appear that a quiet, studious year was underway. I had even forsaken my usual six pack of Rolling Rock during study periods for a case of IGA cream soda. I was just getting settled into this foreign atmosphere when some disjointed screams crashed through the window.

"Freshmen Pussies! Eat Shit Freshmen!"

These cries seemed to evoke an immediate heinous response from my roommate. Within seconds he was speeding through the door, his face already coated with that sick, venal glaze that accompanies The Storming Of The Arch. Determined not to rush into anything, I stayed perched at my window trying to judge the intensity of the shouts. As one of the screams turned to a chant, my doubts were ~~answered;~~ violence was inevitable.

By the time I made it outside, the crowd had grown connsiderably larger, considerably more venal, more vocal, and most of all extremely more vulgar. Every slanderous remark known to man was being hurled at the freshmen class.

About twenty minutes passed and no freshmen had gathered. They had to be rounded up. There was too much hostile energy, too many blood thirsty eyes to allow this opportunity for total violence to pass. A handful of young looking upperclassmen were dispatched to whip up the unsuspecting first year men into a revengeful frenzy.

The first charge against the arch came from the hill across campus. The situation looked bleak for the defenders. It seems most of the vocal crowd wanted a performance, they had no stomach to participate. About 40 freshmen hit a thin, but determined front line.

I was busy having my head trampled into the stone slab of the steps when a muffled cry of, "He broke through!", filtered its way along a dozen set of legs to my ears. Suddenly the two Sophmores beside me broke away in chase, leaving the rest of my body open for the same abuse my head was taking. The time was ripe for an all out assult. A half dozen arch guards were forced to round up the free attacker. With the rear line missing, the upperclassmen were without push power and dangerously out numbered!

Clawing my way back to the top, I sensed a glimmer of hope. It then became brutally clear. The freshmen were so absorbed in blood letting that they had lost sight of the objective. This huge hole I now stood in went totally unnoticed! All around me were biting, scratching, wildly kicking bodies; sixty sets of teeth going stone beserk toward the nearest jugular vein! The will to succeed was gone. That basic killer instinct in all Americans was now running amok.

"One more time. One more time One more time".

The crowd wanted more. But could this be possible? The Arch had already been rushed three times and casualties were mounting heavily on both sides. A bad vibe shot through my mind. Had this become a modern colossium? Were we no more than an army of mercenary gladiators? Had the freshmen become the ignorant christians, lured into the arena by crude trickery? Was there no Tradition, no Sport?

Whack! A hairy, bleeding, forearm snapped me out of my thoughtful coma. No time to ponder these questions now, the fourth attack was underway. This assult had caught me completely by surprise. My mind was whirling!

"React! React! Beat something!", I told myself. "Stomp somebody! It doesn't matter who, it's the action that counts! Give the people what they want!"

"Eat boot!", I screamed

[Along Muddy Run]

by Dave Andrews

As the college community finally gets settled for the current academic year, some prevalent cries of dissatisfaction are beginning to circulate around the Juniata campus. Aside from the usual cursing and damning of the food, there have been some noticable complains concerning the academic program.

Many of these critical comments which are circulating around the dining hall, bathrooms, and other conversation forums are concerning the writing program. Amazingly, a number of these comments are from upperclassmen as well as freshmen. While freshmen are relatively newcomers to the program and have few comments currently, upperclassmen are asking why they are being denied academic credit by instructors who are not members of the faculty (their formal title is institutional assistant). Other upperclassmen are seriously contemplating the validity of the program when after writing a paper for another course they are told "You don't know how to write!"

However, students are not the only people who have questioned the present writing program. In their study on Juniata to give the school accredidation, the Middle States Evaluation Association last year wrote concerning the writing program: "There may be also a special problem connected with the writing program which employs people for low salaries and with no faculty status to teach units in a required program. The team has some question about giving academec credit for units of study taught by people without faculty status and not a member of an academic department."

Furthermore, many of the questionable features of the writing program cannot be fairly attributed to the staff of the program; rather, the inherent structure of the program itself presents certain obstacles to its successful operation. With the extremely low salary

by Henry Siedzikowski

It's the start of a new academic year at Juniata, and we all must be just sitting arounnd and wondering what's in store. The freshmen are getting their introduction to the college experience, and upperclassmen are just wondering what can happen next. What is needed is an introduction to all this madness, and that is what this editorial porports to be.

First in line of topics to be dealt with is the Juniatian, itself. There has been some comment on the fact that this first issue did not appear until October 3. While we obviously cannot deny this, we do have a reasonable explanation. We are very short on staff members. So in the way of advertising, allow us right now to make a plea to all students to consider joining the Juniatian staff. Any students, especially freshmen, who have experience in working on a newspaper, could easily put it to use here. There are a lot of openings and great chances for self-expression and advancement. Anyone interested can just get in touch with me, and before you know it, you'll be part of what's happening now.

This leads us to another phenomenon, the almost unbelievable lack of involvement by this year's freshmen class. We always had between fifty and sixty freshmen turn out for the newspaper, this year we had about fifteen. WJC is reporting the same kind of problem. There were only seven freshmen candidates for the Student Senate this year compared to the normal number of 20-25. At the freshmen meeting to present these candidates, the turnout was so sparse that upperclassmen actually made up a significant portion of the audience. (And there were only about ten of them). There has been a lot of difficulty just filling out the ballot for the steering committee. We fervently hope the freshmen start to make a better showing as the year progresses.

Moving on to a more optimistic note, there will be some changes seen in some old familiar institutions. The Juniatian will begin this year to offer approximately a page each week to the literary efforts of Juniata students. If you have a that you would like to see in print, poem, a short story or an essay send it along to us.

The Student Government this year is entering their first full year under a new constitution. The constitution is supposed to make the student government more efficient. One thing that should be mentioned is that among upperclassmen there has been tremendous interest in the various committees that are Hopefully it will accomplish this. part of the student government. This is a trend that has to be beneficial to student interests on campus.

Dormitory Government also has a new constitution. Hopefully, it will make Dorm Government a meaningfull body for the students. More important, possibly, is the new judicial structure. This body will consist of four students, one of whom is chairman, two faculty and an administrator. It will have decision-making powers.

Well, thats a sketchy outlook of what lies ahead. With a few problems ironed out, it could be a tremendous year. Let's hope it is.

This is, I think, my seventh attempt to review this album. I like it so much I just can't describe it to my own satisfaction. It's a double live album containing a lot of the best songs from her other albums, plus a couple of new ones. And they're all great.

Dory Previn is a brilliant song writer and performer, which this album ably demonstrates. But it's as a lyricist that her real talent lies — the music and her singing both emphasize the words, for each of her songs says something, really communicates, which is rare in musiic nowdays.

She is very intense and sensitive, with an uncanny knack for getting her feelings across to you. The songs are usually depressing, because she's had that type of a life, but they have so much honest emotion in them, that I guarantee you'll be impressed, and moved.

While most of her songs are personal, Dory has an amazing skill for seeing all sides of any issue. Though she constantly writes about the cruelty and absurdity of the woman's role she can turn around and write from the man's point of view (as in "Don't Put Him Down"). You always end up knowing not only how she feels, but how the other guy feels.

Dory reaches us because she hits the part of us we usually try to conceal: the desperate, scared little child, clinging to sanity mostly by sheer luck. The part in every calm, sophisticated adult that's, in her words, "scared to be alone". Dory sings about that part, and makes us admit it's there.

One example is "The Lady With the Braid", one of the best songs on the album. It starts "Would you care to stay till sunrise? Its completely your decision. It's just that going home is such a ride, such a ride. . ." But the casualness is a front; the woman desperately wants the man to stay, but she can't demand, or she'll lose him. As she says in another song "when a woman wants a man she's called

Movie Review

The Apartment

by Stella

The world is full of petty, hypocritical people who get through life playing games. One especially prevalent "game" is that of "you do something for me; I'll do something for you." It happens everyday . . . and it works. Except once in a while, a person comes along who is willing to admit that the reward just isn't worth the price. And, often, that one person is enough to knock a big chunk out of the game board and change the whole course of the play.

The film "The Apartment" deals with this particular game. It deals with it in a very ambiguous way . . . which is the only way. These people trapped in their small world are, on the one hand, absolutely hilarious . . . but you can't get too close to them or they break your heart. Billy Wilder, as director, manages to get just close enough. He is expert enough to let us laugh at the situation and, at the same time, recognize it as a real and serious problem.

Wilder is aided by a cast of very fine actors. Jack Lemmon plays C. C. Baxter, a guy who is trying to get ahead by "paying the price." As usual, Lemmon turns in a great performance which makes his character understandable even when we don't agree with what he does. Fred MacMurray steps away from his customary Walt Disney type roles to play the corporate executive who is making Baxter pay. Shirley MacLaine adds a dimension of real depth to her standard elfin image and becomes, in one of her best performances, a human being who is too great a "price" for Baxter to pay.

The combination of these three professionals, under the direction of the brilliant Billy Wilder, won for this film the Academy Award and Best Picture of 1960. It will be shown on campus Friday, October 5, in Alumni Hall at 8:00 P.M.

Remember last year when you a questionnaire concerning n preferences? That question- re was used as a basis for this r's film series. The themes voted most often were Academy ard winners and comedy. ASH" won the most votes as a gle movie.

Brad Rudy explained how he d others on the film committee Center Board developed this r's film series. The film series to be more organized than in past. Giving a theme to a m's films is one step, and re- wing the films before they are wn is another. Having the re- ws put up around campus be- re the movies is wonderful. The dent doesn't have to go into a vie cold. First he can decide if wants to see it at all and second 'll know something of what the viewers think of and what to pect himself. How many past mpus movies could have been lped by such reviews. Brad is omising reviews in this news- per, and on WJC around five irty the night before the showing, us the usual contemporary re- w posted around campus.

Each term will have films be- nging to the theme and "extras" at are popular movies. The ex- as are not a part of the film ries ticket booklet, but this is cause of the cost of the films. he films' rentals generally cost ywhere from thirty to four-hun- ed dollars. The films committee s a budget of one thousand dol- rs per term. Now if you look at e titles and do some math you'll derstand why you have to pay r the campus movies. Only about o to three hundred students at- nd the movies, so the film series definitely not a profit organiza- on.

It wouldn't be a campus movie thout 'technical difficulties', right? ell, don't shoot the projectionist, e machines are none too great d besides he's just another stu- nt. New machines are being pro- ised, so let's cut the guy a break d have some patience.

The philosophy of the film series to show quality films and recent pular movies as extras. The films the series are organized accord- g to a theme. This term's is Aca- my Award winners. There was intended logic behind their der, alternating between light d heavier topics, but some films uldn't be obtained and there was unbalance, so the order didn't rk out. The reviews will help understanding the films. The ole set up of reviews, and orga- ed themes makes it possible for u to put the films into a context d gain something more. But n't let the idea you might learn mething scare you away, these e quality films and still just great watch! This organization of the ies can make the classic films, reign films and popular films re meaningful.

Hayes Talks To JC Students

by Patrick Minnick

A former school teacher visited Juniata last week. State Representative Samuel E. Hayes, a Republican from this district, was back in the classroom Wednesday September 26 for an hour or two as he spoke to a group of approximately thirty Juniata students and faculty about a few of the mechanics and issues of state government.

Hayes, one of the less senior members of the Pennsylvania House (first elected - 1970, age 33) told his listeners of one of his basic beliefs about government, that the main failures of government administration are not a result of errors in the construction of the system, but instead they are the result of errors in the judgment of the men who operate the system. Governmental efficiency and justice is not to be found by tinkering with the system, but by electing men who are both capable and of good intentions. In short, evil or incompetent men can make a mockery of any system of government.

The representative, who sees himself as a populist, stated his belief that the legislature is the people's branch of government because the legislators stand for re-election more often then the executive and because no one man can control the voting of the House.

If you happen to have some extra money, do buy it. I'm sure you will enjoy every minute of it. To give you a preview of this book, here is some of her poetry.

figures the staff is receiving, who can blame the instructors for cutting a few hours of time from their expected work load? Also, by not being regular faculty, the writing instructors cannot possibly be as readily accessible as the regular, full-time faculty members.

Consequently, the student and his $3500 are the ones to suffer. It is hoped that under Professor Croce's able leadership, this program will experience some detailed evaluation and revision. If there is no change, the responsibility lies with we students to make sure that the writing program fulfills its goals.

Perhaps an open hearing with the writing program staff and students could be a first step toward improvement. Another alternative for evaluation could be the institution of a special committee (composed of faculty and students) to thoroughly study the current program. At this time, imput is needed for the improvement of this program and students must be sure that it is heard.

the understanding of stategy and game theory."

Attitudes toward the seminars seem generally positive so far among students. Those who did not receive their first choices were let down, and others feel that meeting once a week isn't enough. But criticism so far has been light. As Professor Hartman said, "We spent a year on the task force sitting around and asking why is the world the way it is, and how did it come to be that way. And this is our answer, they weren't doing this." Thus was born Freshman Seminar —a new idea with plenty of room to grow.

King Awarded Grant For Music

Dr. Robert King of the Music Dept. was awarded a grant by the state of Michigan to organize and conduct a chamber orchestra this Summer in Escanaba, Michigan. Mrs. King played in the group and also appeared as one of the soloists. For his "contributions to the cultural life of the state" Dr. King was also presented with a citation from the Governor of Kentucky which designates Dr. King as a Kentucky Colonel for his work with the Lexington Philharmonic and the Central Ky. Youth Orchestra.

First Coffeehouse Creates Change In Mini-Theatre

by Lynn Bowman

Frank DiGiovanni presented a "loud, unamerican drug-influenced sex-oriented rock and roll" Coffee House Saturday night.

When Frank first started his performance, I was not that impressed because I thought his background music on tapes was the original group with the lead singer missing and he was filling in. As he continued to play and I talked with the people around me, I found out that the whole background including drums, base, and vocals were pre-taped by Frank. This type of versatility impressed me.

Frank's act was broken up into three sets. His first consisted of songs from several different groups such as Elton John, Todd Rundgren, Little Foot and Humble Pie. His imitations were terrific which is what made me think the background was the origional group.

During his second set he talked about his junior high days, and played three oldies of that time period which his former group played when they first got together. The three oldies were "Louie, Louie," "Hang on Snoopy," and "Give Me Some Money." Then he continued, and played two songs from further on in time and ended the set with two recent rock and roll songs. He talked about the songs and how he grew with his music through adolescence 'till now.

For his last set, he played songs that he wrote himself or his former group created. His first song, "Country" had been a group effort and he said it had no special meaning behind it. He mentioned a lot of his songs were influenced by Todd Rundgren. The set finished with a song called "Twenty Roads" which he had written when he was twenty years old.

Altogether the show was really terrific. The "Little Theater was packed at the beginning of the first set, and people were still coming in. The audience, for the most part, thought Frank was dynamite; at least that is what I gathered from the loudness of the applause.

Writing Program

a test to determine their writing abilities. Exemptions were based on this test and determined before the year began. The test: you were coming to a small town for an interview and your plane was late, Your interviewer takes you directly to his house and puts you in a room with only a bed, bureau, lamp, and a telephone book. If you were to write a letter, what would you say about the town from the telephone book? This is not quite the type of paper one enjoys writing on a summer afternoon, so very few of the Freshmen were shown to have acceptable writing abilities and were exempted from the program.

Professor Croce is again heading the program with the aid of eighteen instructors. Each instructor forms his own lesson plans and assignments, but along certain guidelines.

There has been some discussion about whether the students are here to learn or because of "parental guidance" and part of the program is to get students to observe and think without worring about grades. The student, by discussion, criticism, and continued writing is ideally going to want to work to his own satisfaction rather than for someone else.

Cross Country Men Try Hard In Their First Battle

by Keith Hartman

Freshman Greg Ranson turned in a fine performance Tuesday, but it was to no avail, as Juniata College's cross-country team dropped its opener, 18-44, to a strong Johnstown-Pitt team.

Ransom, top finisher for Juniata with an excellent 23:03 time, finished behind Johnstown-Pitt's Greg Delton, who came in second with a 22:59 time, and Mark Littleman, winning with a record 22:28.6 on the Johnstown-Pitt 4.35 mile course. Juniata's John Ausherman, also a freshman, finished eighth at 23:55. Bill Kibler, who is termed by Coach Jack Swinderman as the most improved runner from last year, rounded out the top ten with a fine 24:04 performance.

Despite the loss, Coach Swinderman is confident that his charges will have a fine season this year. Seven returning lettermen, along with several outstanding freshman, should provide the nucleus for a winning team.

Kibler, Ransom, and Ausherman, along with sophomore Jack McCullough, are all battling for the no. 1 spot. Other competition is coming from captain Jim Bowen, Steve Hooper, Doug Crosby, Bill Demuth, Steve Gretz, Larry Hoover, and Dave Simes. All are returning from last year's competition.

Juniata once again faces a tough schedule, with Bucknell and Franklin and Marshall the toughest opponents the team should encounter this year. Coach Swinderman, who is assisted in his coaching duties by Don Mitchell, feels that once the team is past these two formidable foes, the going should be easier with the competition fairly even.

a predator". She makes us feel the pain of having to be passive, makes me feel the unfairness of the female stereotype far more than most woman's lib speakers.

Though she usually writes autobiographically she expresses things for all of us. She is, in her own line "a witness to our confusion".: "Mary Cecilia Brown. . . climbed to the top of the Hollywood sign/and. . . jumped off the letter "H" cause she did not become a star. She died in less than a minute and a half/ she looked a bit like Hedy Lamarr"

Another of the best songs is about wars and "The Veterans Big Parade": "Our soldiers died, but not in vain/ God was with us, that's for sure/ He proved it, cause it didn't, rain. . ."

Dory writes about almost anything well (there are songs on this record about midgets, the moon, religion, homosexuals, and left-handedness), but her favorite, and best subject is herself: "I always try too hard/ when I find someone new/God, I wish just this once/ you'd need me more than I need you. . ."

This is a very special recording: she doesn't do many concerts, and this was a very good one. Someone in the audience called out "we love you, Dory" and listening, you believe it, and you understand why. She says it for all of us; she's been through it all, and yet is still trying "be careful, baby, be careful/ cause I'll survive in spite of you/ and I'll survive in spite of me/ which is a harder thing to do. . ."

Listen to this album. Or go see her at the Academy of Music in Philly on October 14th. I guarantee, this lady is one of the few writers left who has something to say and can say it well.

Hayes Talk

When asked about the possibility of a change in the Pa. drinking age, Rep. Hayes stated that he was initially against a change because of surveys showing higher rates of automobile deaths and property damage in states where the age was lowered. He told his listeners that his opinions were not concrete, but flexible according to the best information available at a given time. Hayes also gave his impression of Herbert Denenberg, Pa.'s controversial Insurance Commissioner, saying that Deneberg was "a much-needed catalyst" who has speeded up needed change in the field of consumer protection.

Women's Field Hockey Team Starts Season

by Vernne Wetzel

Juniat has finally initiated an intercollegiate field hockey program. For the past few years, girls have gotten together and scrimmaged area high schools. This year, under the coaching of Joanne Reilly, 28 girls are working hard to put a good team together. There is a lot of new talent (24 players are freshmen or sophomores), and we have a challenging schedule for a newly organized team. The season opens Oct. 3 with our team traveling to Carlisle to meet Dickenson. There is a JV team to back up the varsity. The rest of the schedule is:

Oct. 10 Susquehanna
Oct. 18 Indiana
Oct. 20 Lycoming
Oct. 23 Bucknell
Oct. 27 Lycoming (Parents Day)

Field hockey is an action-packed game, so if you have missed seeing it, come out for the home games. The field is the intramural soccer field behind Ellis.

COMMUNICATIONS CENTRAL

The Juniatian will publish and WJC will broadcast notices for upcoming events if received by Friday Noon the week of publication or 5 days before the event is to take place. All information to be published should be submitted IN DUPLICATE to P.O. 996 and should contain the name of the event when and where it will occur and the price for tickets, if any.

Homecoming Weekend Attracts Alumni in Flocks

by Laurie Peacher

Homecoming Weekend has once again sprung upon Juniata. An overabundance of alumni, curious visitors, and a flurry of activities will make the coming weekend of the biggest ones on campus.

Do you like to play golf? Do you feel that you could beat Arnold Palmer with one arm in a sling if only given the chance? Now is your opportunity to display your extreme skill and expertise at this fascinating game by participating in the Alumni-Student Golf Tournament at the Huntingdon Country Club at 8:00 Saturday morning. Please contact the Office of Alumni Affairs (for a slight Green Fee of $6.00) if you plan to play. Then you can see how it bounces, ballwise.

For the artistically minded, Shoemaker Galleries will display a series of drawings from Paolo Soleri's "Cities of the Future". With his ideas of an experimental city, Soleri has been described as an "extraordinary visionary, philosopher, artist, architect". If you're interested in the future and what it looks like, visit the Galleries on Saturday from 9:00 a.m. to 8:00 p.m.

Juniata College will be 100 years old in 1976. Hard to believe, isn't it? Saturday morning at 10:00 in Alumni Hall, the Centennial Fund program will be kicked off. Five million dollars may seem like a lot of money but the Centennial Fund hopes to reach this goal by 1976, the year Juniata will be preparing for its second century of service. The final goal being $10 million, the first goal of $5.3 million was completed in the period 1968/72. This money was raised for the endowment fund, for Ellis Hall, and for general educational advances. The college is planning big things for its 100th anniversary and all faculty and staff are invited to help the Fund get its proper launching.

The nerves will start to tingle and excitement will mount as the actual Homecoming game gets closer. Who will be Homecoming Queen — Marilyn Moore, Cindy Wills, Debby Halschied, Jean Jarrow, or Elayne Fakrenkopf? Who will be the members of her court? What will the individual class displays, located around campus, look like? Who will win the football game? Will Juniata's team keep up its winning streak or succumb to Susquehanna? How will the halftime entertainment, provided by the Huntingdon High School Band, look and sound? By Saturday afternoon at about 4:00, the time when the President's reception for alumni, faculty, and friends will be held on the President's House lawn all these questions should be answered.

If you like foot-stomping, hand-clapping music, then Lester Flatt and the Nashville Grass should be the thing for you. Being held at 8:15 in Oller Hall this group has been responsible for such popular tunes as "Foggy Mountain Breakdown" (theme song of the movie "Bonnie and Clyde") and the theme song from the TV program "The Beverly Hillibillies". A different type of concert to end an unusual day. Come on over to Oller and get into the swing of things.

So if you have nothing else to do this weekend, stop in at JC's campus and give Homecoming a whirl.

J.C. Food Service — Could Be Worse

by Kandy Foust

It's Thursday, around supper time, and you figure you might as well head on down to Ellis and see what they've cooked up this week to take the place of steak night. Perhaps it will be Spanish night, complete with a simulated bullfight, or even Chilean night, where the local American Legion comes in and takes over the Student Government for one evening.

But seriously, the Hallmark Food Service (Juniata's finest), like all food industries at this time, is having to deal with skyrocketing food costs. Unlike some food industries, Juniata's food service cannot directly pass this increase on to the consumer because they must operate on a fixed budget. Here they are faced with a double dilemna. They must somehow keep their cost down and yet still maintain a reasonably high quality of food product and service. This they have accomplished, but it has meant the end of steak night, at least for the foreseeable future. The food service feels that the board-paying student would much prefer losing one steak a week than lose total food quality the rest of the week.

Some students have been asking why there isn't a rebate policy for meals missed, especially when the meals missed are considerable. This seems to be a reasonable request, but in actuality Juniata students rarely pay for all that they eat. In presenting a board estimate to the administration, the food service first figures out the percentage of attendence for each meal and each day of the week. Some weekends, such a Parent's Weekend and Homecoming, are going to have higher attendence figures and this must be taken into consideration. These percentages are averaged together to arrive at an approximate overall attendence percentage. This figure is the one used in determining the board costs. So if you eat almost every meal on campus, you're really getting your money's worth.

Another complaint heard around campus is with the portioning procedure. Some students feel that the

An Interview With The Editor of Kvasir

by Richard Mettler

Rick: Are you Jim McDonald, the editor of Kvasir?

Mac: Why yes.

Rick: Wonderful. (Begrudgingly) Well I'm supposed to interview you so let's get on with it.

Mac: OK. (he said aesthetically) Why don't we go to my office in 309 Founders?

SHORTLY . . . .

Rick: So what good is Kvasir to the Students at Juniata? (bored)

Mac: Basically Kvasir provides an outlet for the students' creative writing. In the past it usually meant a small collection of poetry, but this year we hope to do much more.

Rick: (With vague interest) Oh yea? How's it going to be different this year?

Mac: Although our budget this year is pitifully small we hope to sponsor a much wider spectrum of literary activities. In brief these are: 1. Thanks to the cooperation of the Juniatian Staff, Kvasir will publish a column as we get student contributions. 2. Kvasir will sponsor a student-run in the paper writing workshop. 3. We will also sponsor a variety of readings by both professional writers and students. 4. And we intend to have a contest awarding cash awards to student contributors of various kinds of writings.

Rick: (aghast) You mean Kvasir won't be strictly poetry this year?

Mac: Definitely not. We want any

Samuel Becket Theme Of English Dept. Festival

The English Department, in conjunction with the Focus Series, will present a three day festival, October 21-23, honoring Samuel Becket. Becket, winner of the 1969 Nobel Prize for Literature, is renown as a playwright of avant-garde theatre.

Tentatively scheduled on the opening night of the festival, October 21, are three Becket films, "Eh, Joe," "Film," and "The Good: Act Without Words." Following the films there will be a commentary by Prof. Larry Riggs of the French Department.

On Monday, October 22, Prof. Ralph Church, Dr. Virginia Floyd, and Mr. Gless Gress will team up to discuss, to interpret, and to act some of Becket's works.

The festival will culminate on Tuesday evening with the Focus Series presentation of Not I and Krapp's Last Tape, two plays by

EDITORIAL

by Henry Siedzikowski

In order to please the vast number of loyal followers, which I am sure I have, I have decided to devote this week's editorial to the national political scene. However, since I have decided to adopt a more conservative stance this year, I have decided to deal with an issue which we all can agree on.

The subject for today is the financial aid situation. For all my veteran fans, I can assure you that "Tricky Dick" is still a villan. 'What did he do this time?" you ask. Well, sometime in the early part of this month, our beloved President Nixon is expected to veto another bill. There doesn't seem to be anything particularily unusual about that. But the bill he's going after this time is the Labor-Health Education and Welfare Appropriations bill.

For any student on campus receiving financial aid, this is a pretty important matter. The bill includes an increase of $400 million in federal student financial aid (grants, loans, work-study) over the amount this fall. This will not only relieve the financial burden on many students, but would also help many colleges halt their increasing deficits. A veto which is not overridden by Congress would wipe all this out.

Student lobbing groups are now preparing an all-out drive to pressure Congress into overriding the anticipated veto. They are asking Student Governments to send messages to their Congressmen. This issue will be before the Juniata Student Senate very shortly. It would be to your benefit to check with your senators, and make sure they are voting in favor of such a resolution.

[Along Muddy Run]

This year could be the last for the Juniatian. An idea has been proposed by Jim MacDonald (editor of the Kvasir, the literary magazine), and supported by the various other media heads, to combine all of the written communications media on campus into one bi-monthly general interest magazine.

I have not exactly been a defender of the status quo in the past, but there does seem to be a definite purpose for each of the individual modes of communication on campus. The Juniatian provides immediacy to the campus concerning various past and future activities. Events are not usually planned well enough in advance on this campus and it is doubtful that a bi-monthly magazine could effectively publicize many upcoming events more than a week in advance.

Furthermore, it would seem highly unlikely that students would want to read news and sports that occurred six or seven weeks ago rather than news that occurred in the past week.

There are reasons why this new proposal may appear attractive. It has been a pretty dominant view the past few years that the Alfarata has not been a journalistic masterpiece. The newspaper has been fairly haphazard about its reporting since late last year. But does that mean we should abandon them completely? With new staffs this year there could be a definite difference in quality. If not, it is our, we the students, fault they do not succeed.

They have a purpose. The three written media provide different perspectives of the campus and the world. To combine them into one form would limit the diversity of the student body. One editorial stall would be dispensing its' views instead of three separate staffs.

But, many of the media heads seem to be disillusioned this year by the lack of student interest working on the respective media. Some are questioning if each individual medium really does serve a useful purpose for the student body.

And one cannot blame editors like MacDonald and Henry Siedzikowski (Juniatian editor) for feeling somewhat purposeless. On one hand, they are understaffed. But, at the same time, other students tell them they don't like their respective media. Perhaps this new idea may be the only alternative to pursue if the current situation persists.

Letters to the Editor

Greetings!

Well, the start of another school year is underway and it seems sort of strange not being with friends at JC. The "Hop" is treating me pretty well amidst all of the adjustments that I've had to make in transferring.

My purpose in writing this letter is to convey to you the advantages of a school such as Juniata, now that I can look at the situation from the outside and having experienced JC for two years.

You, as students, should be thankful for the really personal atmosphere that you have among students, faculty, and administration. It is quite easy to know everyone on campus and say "hi" to everyone you happen to pass. This is not as easy here at the "Hop" as it was at JC. Classes are fairly impersonal. Mine average around 160 students in each course. The large one numbers approximately 300!

Being the size of Juniata, it is fairly easy to get what you want with very little delay. Waiting is a common word at the "Hop". You must wait for everything around here. Surprisingly though, the registration proceeded very smoothly. To give a case in point, the other night I waited for not one, not two, not three, but four hours and 15 minutes to get interviewed for a couple of Hopkins' Student Council committees. Students are pretty involved in S.C. activities.

Tons of people intermingled waiting to get interviewed for the eleven positions. This brings me to ask all of the JC students to get involved in Student Government, especially since JC's Student Government is a pretty persuasive organization with the administration and faculty. It has more say than the Student Council here at JHU. The Juniata students should appreciate the fact that their Student Government has such an im-

Modes Program Discussed

Editor's Note: Last week the Juniatian highlighted the other two Freshmen courses from a Frosh's point of view. Because of a lack of space we did not include the article on Modes. This week we are completing that series with this addition.

by Debbie deVry

You can spot this year's Freshman class right away. They're the ones with the worried faces— "Will I ever get my Huck Finn paper finished on time?" That is just one of the many assignments due for Modes of Thought and Methods of Inquiry.

Modes, under the direction of Dr. Lakso, is a two-unit course made up of ten staff members of various departments at Juniata. Tutors are also available for help, and many have already been used to their fullest. The program is designed to investigate the questioning process and make students aware of the role values play in inquiry. Modes uses the scientific method as a model for the correct problem solving and continually forces the students to evaluate the strengths and weaknesses of the process.

Ross's book Symbols and Civilization is the course's main reference. Through the use of films (Metropolis, Medium Cool, and Blow Vp), literature, and social science problems, the students discuss logic, deductive elaboration and various data gathering techniques in the context of the scientific method.

Generally the incoming Freshmen have found Modes rather difficult but helpful in learning to think clearly. This year involves much more reading and work than in the previous two years. Maybe now the professors have more confidence in their program and feel justified in giving the student more to handle. A few critisisms have involved the vagueness of the assignment instructions, and some tutors who should be better qualified in helping explain problems.

Hoffman Portrays Scholar, Borgnine Plays Loser in This Week's Movies

by Stella

"Straw Dogs" is one of the most unnerving movies I have ever seen. Brilliantly directed by Sam Peckinpah, it is a major achievement as a film dealing mainly with violence. True, most of Peckinpah's films deal with this subject, but while "The Wild Bunch" (perhaps his most famous film) merely sickened me and made we vow to be more careful about walking in on films that I knew nothing about, "Straw Dogs" fascinated me like few movies I have ever seen. I don't think I actually saw more than five minutes of the last half hour or so of "The Wild Bunch" because I had my face buried in my hands trying to avoid watching blood pour out of shotgun wounds. During the last half hour of "Straw Dogs," on the other hand, I sat on the edge of my seat, straining to try to see everything that was going on at once and came away from it so emotionally drained that I was numb.

The main reason for my change of attitude would have to be Dustin Hoffman's performance in "Straw Dogs." In "The Wild Bunch." the "protagonists" were a gang of middle-aged villians. They were wicked at the beginning when they were shooting other people and they're still wicked at the end when they get shot by other people and no where in that movie do I ever feel sorry for or empathize with them. But Dustin Hoffman created a link, for me at least, between the screen and myself. During most of the movie, I didn't quite know what to make of him. He's a scholar; so much so that it's ridiculous. All he thinks about are his studies. He lets his wife flirt with the men who are working on his house and even after these same men have raped her, he still doesn't seem at all upset. But, finally he finds himself caught up in a battle between the men of the small town in which he and his wife are staying(she had been raised there) and a half-witted young man who has molested a teen-age girl. At this point, something in Hoffman snaps and he becomes a real person, fighting to protect his home and to keep the madman safe until he can be given a real trial. As the rage in Hoffman mounts, the film explodes and we are left, at the end, as exhausted and stunned as he is.

"Straw Dogs" will be shown in Oller Hall this Friday, October 12, at 8:00 P.M. It is not included in the regular "series" for the term, therefore, there will be an admission charge of $0.50.

"Marty," starring Ernest Borgnine, is a charming story of a perennial loser—a man who is simply trying to live his own life without offending the dozens of people who are trying to live it for him.

Marty comes from an Italian neighborhood where everyone knows everyone else's business and the question most asked is: "When are you going to get married?" And poor Marty, who can't even get a date, is forced to cope with this question everyday of his life. So, he finally meets a girl—a sweet and nice but rather plain girl. And his problems begin, instead of end, there. To his bachelor friends, who spend their evenings sitting around in a drugstore, she's "the dag," to his mother, she's a threat and—God forbid!—not Italian. Happily, though, Marty decides to make up his own mind this time and reach out to the life that he wants.

Ernest Borgnine won the Academy Award for Best Actor of 1955 for his sensitive portrayal of Marty. And television fans will remember both Frank Sutton, who plays Marty's best friend, Angie, from "Gomer Pyle, U.S.M.C." and Jerry Paris, who plays Marty's brother-in-

Director Responds: "Unfounded and False Insinuations"

It was with great interest and some confusion that I read the first article of a new column in the Juniatian, "Along Muddy Run" by Dave Andrews. I was interested because of what I infer the intent of the column to be: the promotion of concern, interest and meaningful criticism of all aspects of campus life by the college community. Everybody should welcome such a column and applaud its intent. The column also interested me because it concerned the Writing Program, the "able leadership" of which is mine. My confusion about the article stems largely from my inability to discern its focus. While there is no question that Mr. Andrews is asserting that dissatisfaction with the program exists — a situation of which I am well aware — I fail to see in his argument any clear rational reason for the dissatisfaction. What his argument expresses is a great deal of misunderstanding about the program by some upperclassmen, and unfounded and finally false insinuations.

Andrews states that "upperclassmen are asking why they are being denied academic credit by instructors who are not members of the faculty (their formal title is instructional assistant)." Such a question shows great misunderstanding (and it baffles the Hell out of me) because, with the exception of some transfer students and some few special others, who took an equivalent course at another institution, ALL upperclassmen, if they have taken Writing Program and not English Conference, have not been denied credit for the Writing Program. If they had, they would not be here to complain about it. Writing Program must be successfully completed by the beginning of one's Sophomore year. Those students who fail to do so may not return to Juniata. Not only is writing competency a requirement for graduation, it is also, now, a prerequisite for being an upperclassman. Futhermore, students are neither given nor denied credit by instructional assistants. As the only bona fide faculty member in the program, all final papers must be read and evaluated by me. While the staff advises me, and while I have yet to overturn a decision by a staff member to grant or deny competency, legally I award or deny the credit.

Mr. Andrews' second point, while more noteworthy, demonstrates not only a misunderstanding of what the Writing Program can accomplish, but also a failure to take a many factors as possible into account in coming to a judgment. Mr. Andrews reports, "other upperclassmen are seriously contemplating the validity of the program when after writing a paper for another course they are told 'you don't know how to write!'" (My assumption here is that it is the instructor of the other course who is telling him so and not the Writing Program instructor.) I am very sympathetic to that situation and understand resentment from anyone, who, after receiving competnecy in an area, is told by someone else that he really doesn't have it. However, there are a great many variables in the above complaint by upperclassmen. We don't know why the student can't write. Like anything else, writing is a skill that one loses by not doing. (The converse of that statement is true also.) Try staying off the golf course for a year, and see if your score doesn't rise sharply when you go back. Perhaps the student, before he wrote the paper which prompted the instructor's comment, hadn't written in a while. Another thing to consider is that there is great correlation between how well a student understands his material and how well he writes about it. If a student, for whatever reason, hasn't mastered his subject, which necessitates ordering his ideas of a given area, he cannot be expected to write a well-ordered, comprehensible paper. Finally, there is the question itself to be considered in trying to decide why the student hasn't written a decent paper. Good questions are more likely to beget good answers and vice versa. The fault for poor writing, may not lie necessarily in the student not having command of the mechanics of written English, (the Program attempts at least that and more) and therefore may not necessarily reflect an ineffective program.

None of the above argument denies the truth of Mr. Andrews' assertion that student's are questioning the program's effectiveness. It pleads for the gathering of more substantial data before coming to a judgment.

In an attempt to provide some data, let me offer the report to last year's Academic Planning Committee made by the Sub-Committee on Evaluation of the Writing Program. This report has both positive and negative findings. It does make the point, however, that the majority of students think the program is effective. The Workshops gain more support than in the previous year, and the tutorials continue to be highly thought of by students. The report states: "Findings and Interpretations: There were similarities in the WP's problems between last year's evaluations and this year's. Although there was considerable discontent with the Workshops, (Again, we mention a strong verbal expression of disapproval which came from virtually every freshman seminar visited) there was not as much as last year (fewer than 50% of last year's students found the workshops effective, 60% of students this year found it effective). Satisfaction with tutorials was very big this year (as it was last year) with 62% of the students (this year) ranking it as more than effective. Many students wished tutorials could be expanded; that they benefitted more from private conferences with their instructors."

Not all the evidence was positive: "The major differences dealt wiith the instructors and the book. Freshmen were rather vague as to why they were dissatisfied with instruction and part of this dissatisfaction may have come from a Juniatian article, published briefly before our survey, about the non-faculty status of WP instructors. There was again, dissatisfaction with differences in assignments and evaluations among different instructors.

Most dissatisfaction existed with the book. Students found it boring, over their heads, in general not helpful. . . ."

The Writing Program then is not perfect. It has problems which have to be worked out. But, on the otherhand, on the basis of the additional information I have submitted, it does not loom as the dismal failure Mr. Andrews would imply with his evidence.

I submit the above with the hope of making a case for casting a wider net before making judgments, with the hope of demonstrating the complexity of the problems concerning the task of the Writing Program, and finally with the hope also of demonstrating our awareness of the problems.

What follows Mr. Andrews' initial reporting of student dissatisfaction confuses me totally. It is a quotation from the Middle States report. The exact relevance of the quotation to what the column says so far is not all that clear to me, and so I am hard-put to deal with it. In the context of the column it would seem that Middle States recognizes a "special problem" arising from underpaid para-professionals teaching a required course. Even going to the report itself (p. 5) isn't all that helpful. Middles States never explicitly defines "special problem."

From what follows in the column however, Mr. Andrews has deduced the special problem as: low salaries and non-faculty status, which he seems to submit by implication as the reason why Writing Program instructors are "cutting a few hours of time from their work load." He also asserts that "by not being regular faculty (Writing Program instructors) cannot possibly be as readily accessible as the regular, full-time faculty members." These may be Mr. Andrews' deductions. However, except for containing one true fact and one possibly true fact, his deductions have nothing to do with reality.

Mr. Andrews is correct when he says that salaries are low. But what is he insinuating by non-faculty status? If he means not being able to vote at Faculty meetings, not being eligible for retirement pensions, not getting those other fringe benefits to which regular faculty is entitued, then he is correct again. However, if he means the staff lacks the academic qualifications for their job, then he is dead wrong. A simple look in the Juniata College catalog will bear out that the staff is amply qualified. Everyone as at least a B.A., and in addition there are staff with Masters degrees and others beyond the Masters with course work toward the Ph. D. Middle States was very quick to point out that many Writing Program instructors had "credentials equal to members of the faculty" (p. 9). If credentials are at all relevant to one's qualifications, I submit the staff is more than amply qualified academically.

It is the second part of Mr. Andrews' implied deduction that is most disturbing because to the best of my knowledge it isn't true. Writing Program instructors have,

Straight Talking Smith
"Muddy Thinking" Dave

I've just gotten my morning coffee and I see it's a beautiful day: the kind of day I was married on, the kind of day I'd like to walk in a pasture on, the kind of day I'd like to go hunt up dying Trough Creek Park on; and what pops into my mind? Dave Andrews. His muddy thinking essay in his new column. I read it once, aloud, to another lowly, ill-paid "Institutional Assistant." We were angry and insulted. but it was too nice a day and we had too much to do to analyze it: our anger, that is.

Today I think I'm angry because, contrary to Mr. Andrews' conjectures, and that's all his column is, I take my Writing Program work seriously, and I work damn hard and, he's right, my salary isn't great. Moreover I do only have a B.A. degree. Additionally, I'm not a faculty member— like he says, an "Institutional Assistant." So why do I do this work? Because I like it, and I think sometimes I'm pretty good at it.

But, what bothers me most is that Dave Andrews seems to have no idea of the kind of thing we do: and the kind of thing we do demands some degree— I said some degree— of rapport with Freshmen. They may surely dislike us personally. I don't get along with everyone I meet. But there has to be some kind of small group feeling developing in the first weeks of the Writing Program. And Dave's article hits us at a time when that feeling is developing or going down the drain. Unfounded, vague, feelings and judgments as well as conjectures about our qualifications or how hard we work or what faculty have said about upperclassmen's writing (they've said that time out of mind: how much writing have you had to do since you were a Freshmen, most of you?) at this time of the two terms can hinder that development of group respect.

The thing about me is that I'm not nice. I know from my husband that Dave's a great person. I know from Jerry Croce that the Juniatian plans to try for more subjective kinds of articles this year. I know from watching Dave play tennis that he has a fine body, and from talking to him at dinner that he can be charming. What's more. I know that because he was Student Government president last year and because of all the things that I've mentioned in this paragraph, he no doubt has about 100% of the student body behind him; nevertheless I can still dislike him intensely right now because he didn't have the courtesy, decency, and what's more, the responsibility, to come to us to talk before he opened his muddy head to spew forth his column and mess up my developing or failing classes.

But, had he asked us institutional assistants I thing we'd have been glad to sit right down with him and some other students and try to explain to him just what our goals are (he doesn't mention them in his essay): as a matter of fact, I'd still be willing to, even though I think he's a charming knuckle-head. But, of course, he does offer and alternative: let the faculty and students form a committee to examine us: put us on the old spread-eagle table, anaesthetize us so we can't talk back, and then come up with a report. Right on, Dave.

And, oh, Dave! Check out, please, our availability to students against that of faculty and see what you find out: consider in your survey both our salary and our number of contact hours, plus our hours scheduled for the office, during which time we can see any student who wants to see us (including you, Mr. Andrews).

Oh. Hell. I'm going out to a public sale at Waterfall where I can watch the pleasanter people and walk in a field where I can swing at puffy, feathery plants and spread their seads, all the while wishing each one could be charming old Andrews head.

Run Over G-Town

Indians Continue Winning Streak

The game was over but the big question still remained. No, not whether the defense was for real or was the offense that good, but what is a HOYA? This seemed to be about the only thing in question Saturday in the nation's capital as JC showed its dominance from the opening kickoff to the closing gun, rolling over Georgetown 27-0.

JC won the toss for the first time this year and any fear of this being a bad omen was quickly dispelled when Carmen took the opening kickoff up the sidelines all the way to the Hoya's 35, just missing breaking it for the score. It was just a few plays later that Lou Eckerl slammed into the end zone for the first score. This was to be the trend as JC would score; then the defense would take over, and I do mean take over! Whether it was Georgetown running or passing, the Indian defense held tough. JC proceeded to score 27 points and the young Juniata defense put on another stellar performance in recording their second consecutive shutout.

It was a well-rounded offensive performance with Gary Shope firing two touchdowns to his tight ends Pete Lentini and Frank Wiley. Mike McNeal bulled over to round out the scoring. In all it was another fine performance as JC rolled to its eighth straight victory.

This week the Juniatians take on the Cousades from Susquehanna in the Homecoming game. Susquehanna is coming off a tough loss last week to Western Maryland 14-11

Rick: How about graphics?

Mac: Because of our budget limitation, certain types of graphics will be too expensive to reproduce. However, we can accept drawings, cartoons, and possibly woodcuts and etchings. Graphics contributors should conntact Chris Umble, class of '74, our art editor at P.O. Box 1376.

Rick: Who else do you have on your editorial staff?

Mac: In addition to Chris and myself Barb Clain, class of '75, is the assistant editor but I could use another literary assistant. (hint)

Rick: Do you have any problems getting contributions?

Mac: The biggest problem is making student aware of Kvasir and its aims. There are two other minor problems that arise frequently: 1. Students are reluctant to contribute because they suspect their work won't be judged fairly. This simply is not true. We want and need contributions from everyone. Contributions will be judged by the editorial staff solely on merit and anything that has any literary value will be published. 2. Some students feel that their writing is of such quality that they intend to publish elsewhere. Since Kvasir doesn't assume any copyrights these students need not withhold their works for that reason.

Rick: (exuberantly) Where can students send contributions?

Mac: To my office here in 309 Founders or mail them to me through P.O. Box 231.

Rick: (ecstatically) Tell me more about the contest.

Mac: All the details haven't been worked out yet but there will be several categories with cash awards for each.

Rick: Well that just about says it all.

Mac: Say Rick, about that second assistant editor. . . .

portions given are too small; they "couldn't fill up your grandmother" There are two reasons why this is done with the main courses: (1) to cut waste and (2) to gear production in the kitchen. The food service figures out approximately how many portions per tray. This gives the kitchen more time to prepare the food and thus, alleviates some of the waiting for firsts. New innovations this year include the self-service vegetable tray and the diningroom seconds table. The first of these innovations allows the student to pile up his plate with vegetables—the sky's the limit! The second eliminates some of the time spent in getting refills.

All this and you're still not satisfied? Well, tell it to Ed or Phil; they aim to please. Hallmark Food Service would like to keep our business so they're responsive to student complaints. Your ideas will be listened to.

except in a few instances, met their workshops unfailingly. In addition, Writing Program policy states that if instructor should be unable to meet their classes on any given day, then they should notify the director who will substitute for them. Students last year who had either tona Norris or Faye Brigaman will back me on that.

With regard to their being inaccessible: Writing Program instructors are required to meet twice as many hours in their offices as faculty. Faculty are requested to hold a minimum of five hours a week. (Many hold more.) All but four instructors in the program (these four have fewer than 20 students) meet in their offices for ten hours a week. (Faculty, of course, meets classes more often than Writing Program instructors). It would seem then that, unless instructors are not holding their tutorials, and I have no evidence that they are not, they are quite accessible to their students. Furthermore, some instructors have asked for "free time" between tutorials in case they and their students find it necessary to run overtime. So, Mr. Andrews' implications are off-base here also. Writing Program instructors are not remiss.

Mr. Andrews also implies a causal connection in his deduction between how the Writing Program staff is treated and how they perform. Again, the implied causality is false. There is no connection between what instructors are paid and how they perform. Middle States was deeply concerned about the treatment of the Writing Program staff because it is composed mainly of women: "It should be noted that most of the assistants in the Writing Program are women, often with credentials equal to members of the faculty. Both their sub-faculty status as well as their low salary might suggest an instance of unequal treatment of women," and later in the report, Middles States wonders "if this group of special instructors would not benefit from being attached to one of the academic departments, perhaps English" (p. 9). Middle States is concerned for the staff of the writing program but does not see what may seem inequitable treatment as interfering with the duties of the instructors nor the effectiveness of the program: "Because of its special importance in the new curriculum, we might . . . note briefly that the newly conceived Writing Program has apparently gotten off to a strong start and we gather that students are responding positively to it. It would appear that it is being well-administered and that the staff members involved are carring out their responsibilities with enthusiasm and care" (p. 9). The implication to be drawn is clear: Writing Program instructors are doing their job well DESPITE certain inequities. Because I have no concrete evidence to th contrary, either from Mr. Andrews or anyone else, I must agree with Middle States.

I dismiss Mr. Andrews' insinuations for another reason — my own experience with the staff. I want to say now that in my entire career I have never worked with a more devoted, capable, imaginative, hard-working, enthusiastic group of people, and it is impossible for me to think they could be irresponsible.

Mr. Andrews expresses in his column the hope that the program will experience some detailed evaluation and revision. We both have and will. In its report to Academic Planning Committe last year, the Sub-Committee on Evaluation made the following recommendations all of which have been acted upon:

"(1) That the procedure for showing competency be made available to Freshmen at the beginning of the course and explained to the students by their instructors." We acted upon this recommendation this term. Students were told about the formal requirements for competency and were given the Statement on Competency at Freshmen Orientation. In addition, I have asked my staff to be sure that all course ground rules be made clear in the very first Workshop.

"(2) That the book be better explained to the students so they understand why they are using it and how it can contribute towards their writing improvement." The book continues to be a problem and not only has its relevance been the subject of many a staff meeting, but also a subject of many a Workshops. Some of us have even enlisted student help in this area. I have asked and shall continue to ask my Workshop to consider the question of the book's relevancy. Should we conclude at anytime that the book is not relevant, we shall abandon it. Some sections already have. To those who wonder about the possible loss of the common experience, which provides the structure to any multi-section course, that may result from abandoning the book, let me assure them that structure remains through the syllabus. We have decided that we may abandon the book, but no Writing Program instructors may take it upon themselves to abandon the syllabus. "(3) That some mechanism for evaluation of individual instructors be developed by the director of the course and that students be given the opportunity to express to him specific complaints about instruction." We have not acted as quickly in this area as we have in the previous two because, while I recognize its importance, I feel that other factors contingent upon a solid and fair evaluation mechanism must be dealt with first. We need first to come to a greater understanding of not only the philosophical underpinnings of the Writing Program, but also how they relate to methodology, before we can establish criteria to judge ourselves. We have taken this first step, and all Freshmen know, if they have read the syllabus, that one of our chief concerns this year is teaching dynamics, and that we plan to video tape workshops to provide the basis for a discussion of methodology. In this way we can begin to develop cooperatively the formulation of criteria for evaluation. There have been some instructors among us who were not content to wait for all that, however, and who, last year, on their own, gave out questionnaires to students in an attempt to receive some feedback that might enable them to improve their teaching. With regard to the second part of the recommendation, students have always had the opportunity to see me in my office — and some have — to talk about the program. I realize that being able to see me is not enough and that it is only the extreme cases I get to hear about. At this point, I can only say I am aware of the problem and will deal with it.

Mr. Andrews most positive comment is that input is needed. I couldn't agree with him more. We want input from students desperately and hope to provide throughout this year opportunities to students to point up inadequacies in the program and also make suggestions for improvements. Furthermore, to promote greater communication and the sharing of knowledge, I would like to extend an open invitation to the college community to attend and observe our weekly staff meetings. They are held in G107 every Tuesday and Wednesday afternoon at 4 p.m.

In conclusion, I wish to apologize if I seem to have come down a bit hard on Mr. Andrews. It is never my intent to bully a student. As a matter of fact, I am really quite grateful to Mr. Andrews for giving me the opportunity to clear the air and correct misunderstandings. I commend him for his courage to say what is probably on the minds of a great many others, and I hope he continues in his role of gadfly in order to provoke meaningful dialogue about all aspects of college life. Go get 'em Dave.

Hume Cronyn and Jessica Tandy Present Becket Plays to Open Artists Series

by Mike Houck

The first performance of Juniata's Artist's Series takes place on October 23rd with Hume Cronyn and Jessica Tandy in two one act plays by Samuel Beckett: "Krapp's Last Tape" and "Not I." This performance is in conjunction with the English Department's and Focus Series' festival of Samuel Beckett's works and is to honor the Nobel Prize winner for his exceptional talent.

Hume Cronyn and Jessica Tandy, as a husband and wife team, won the "Obie" award at Lincoln Center in New York for their outstanding performance in the two plays to be presented on campus. Winning honors is not unusual for the duo as they both have distinguished careers in Broadway, radio, television, and motion pictures.

Mr. Cronyn is not only an outstanding actor but has proved himself as a noted director, producer, and writer of stage, television, and motion picture performances. He made his acting debut on Broadway in 1934 and appeared in a number of popular plays since. Miss Tandy made her New York debut in 1930 and after her marriage to Mr. Cronyn they co-starred in such Broadway plays as "The Man in a Dog Suit," "The Fourposter," "Madam, Will You Walk," "The Physicists," and "A Delicate Balance." Besides plays Miss Tandy has also worked in such popular movies as "The Birds," "The Desert Fox," and "Dragonwyck."

The fine talent of Mr. Cronyn and Miss Tandy has not gone unnoticed as they both have won distinguished awards for their performances. Jessica Tandy won both the "Tony" and The Twelfth Night Club Awards in 1948 for her outstanding performance in "A Streetcar Named Desire" while Mr. Cronyn has been awarded in 1964 the "Tony" Award for his performance in "Hamlet" and was nominated for the Academy Award for his part in "The Seventh Cross."

The performance of the Beckett plays by Mr. Cronyn and Miss Tandy will be held in the Oller Auditorium and begins at 8:00 P.M. It should be quite an experience to see such acclaimed actors in person and should not be passed up.

What Is Transcendentalism And Its Place At Juniata?

by Dave Mitchell

What is transcendental meditation?

That's what I asked myself when my news editor assigned me to do a story on the subject. And I found the answer to be alot different from what I thought it to be.

Transcendental meditation can be defined as a technique used to relax the body and to release nervous tensions and frustations from the system. It is not some kind of religion as some people may think it to be, and it's not some kind of screwball exercise technique where you sit around with your feet in your armpits and your elbows up your nostrils. In actuality, it is very simple to perform. One just sits in a comfortable position and concentrates on his mantra. A mantra can be defined as some sort of personal sound which applies to only one individual and is given to you by your teacher.

Transcendentalism was explained to me by several Juniata students who had taken or are in the process of taking the course. The course is being offered for the second time this year at Juniata through the Students International Meditation Society (SIMS), and is in progress right now. The actual course takes only four days. The first day is spent in learning technique with only you and your teacher present. The remaining three days are spent with the group learning theory and background. Learning to meditate is not hard; it requires little physical and mental effort and no type of special requirements or experience at all. At present, ten students are taking the course while six took it earlier this year.

Right now, the group is in the process of obtaining a charter from the student government to become an official campus organization.

I noted several very positive facts as I interviewed a number of campus students who had taken the course. Each one said that the course had definitely had an effect upon his lifestyle and that he could now shed himself of his frustrations and tensions very simply in the two sessions of self meditation, which are to be practiced twice a day. One person who had practiced the technique for several months finds that it is much easier to get along with others, and let little things which once annoyed you just pass by. Several of the members said that it was definitely worth the forty five dollars enrollment fee and that they had no regrets. One person mentioned that he had never heard anyone who had taken the course say anything at all bad about it.

Transcendental meditation is growing at a rapid pace in the United States (five thousand new members a month) and has definite scientific data from reputable science journals that it is an aid, and beneficial to one's physical and health.

Perhaps in the forseeable future, TM will be the answer to the frustrations and tensions caused by our rapidly growing and changing technological society.

Grass Comes to Juniata

by Ken Saul

Saturday night the people in Oller Hall were getting high on grass. . .Bluegrass that is. Lester Flatt and the Nashville Grass was the group selected for Homecoming this year, much to the chagrin of many J.C. students. The rumblings of discontent were being heard in September when word of the selection was still a rumor. Then a few weeks later when the rumor was validated many J.C. students could be heard complaining, "How can they expect to sell tickets to see a group like that. I won't buy one."

Their complaints turned out to be prophetic. Not many tickets were sold. At least not many tickets were sold in comparison with Homecoming concerts of the last few years. But enough tickets were sold to fill Oller Hall. True, there were a few empty seats, but damn few.

I took a lot of ribbing about my intentions of going to the concert. People kept saying things like, "You'd better go early. You want to get a good seat. I know of at least three other people who are going." It didn't bother me. I like Bluegrass, and I like Lester Flatt and I did go early. I'm glad I did because, as I said, Oller Hall was filled.

The concert held special interest for me in that it was the first chance I'd had to hear Lester's new group since he and Earl Scruggs broke up. I had already heard the "Earl Scruggs Revue" and I was very disappointed. I also could not imagine a back-up group better than the Foggy Mountain Boys who played with Flatt and Scruggs. Well, if the Nashvill Grass aren't better, they're certainly as good.

The group consists of Kenny Ingram on 5-string banjo. This is his first year with Lester Flatt and he is certainly not as good a Earl Scruggs, but if you were expecting him to be you weren't being fair. Charlie Nixon plays dobro or as Lester called it, "hound-dog guitar". Curlie Sechlar plays guitar and sings tenor for the group. Johnny Montgomery plays bass fiddle. Paul Warren, the fiddle player has been with Lester Flatt for 19 years. I'm inclined to agree with Lester that Paul is one of the finest fiddlers in the business. The sixth man rounding out the group is 15 year-old Marty Stuart on mandolin.

This little guy stole the show with his almost unbelievable mandolin picking. The crowd loved him and asked for an encore on almost every song in which he was featured. I had the pleasure of

by Stella

I have not seen "Tom Jones" yet but I am looking forward to it. Based on the novel by Henry Fielding, the movie is supposedly true to the book (certainly a rarity in the history of film adaptations) and, in some cases, is even better. With Albert Finney, Suzannah York, and Hugh Griffith starring (and Lynn Redgrave making her sceen debut as a servant girl), the odds are already in its favor and most of what I've heard seems to confirm the fact that this film deserved the Academy Award for Best Picture of 1963.

The novel, which I have read, is wonderfully bawd. Tom Jones, the foundling son of Squire Allworthy, is a guy who has absolutely incredible luck with women. They seduce him! All right! He is a young, innocent boy led astray by wicked, wanton women of the world—trying valiantly to, very politely, dissuade them so that he can get back to his true love, Sophia. Of course, it does not always work out that way and Tom—poor baby doll!— occassionally succumbs. He, finally, ends up with Sophia but his (mis?) adventures before hand make for a riotously funny book.

Movie-goers can decide for themselves if this film was worthy of the critical acclaim which it received when it is shown in Alumni Hall on Friday, October 19, at 8:00 p.m.

Lime

by Edward Kinchley Evans

One of the great lies we tell ourselves is that old apocrypha that all men are created equal. Nowhere is this a self-evident truth. It would not disturb the flickering T.V. picture of Humanity as it is currently received by our grease coated optics to discover that God when He flings a new soul into existence does not think about us all on an equal wave length. How one might go about asking Him about His quality control is a bit beyond my ambition. It would seem from my observation that far from us all being created equal, we all have been given a body, a soul, and a mind (each in questionable condition) with a laudering tag attached stating the simple instruction to "make the best of it". The only time equality comes into it is at at the beginning and the end; we are 'birthed' and we is 'deaded' with a click of the old heart shutter.

Now a disturbing factor in mouthing but not believing in one of these self-evident truths we pamper ourselves with when we grow fat with self-satisfaction and start to aid those not so blessed is that 'they' resent our attitude about as much as we do. God has given us all a marvelous gift, the gift of feeling. It is an unfailing antenna to receive and acknowledge your primary intention. If you don't believe what you are saying or doing, you're as obvious as you secretly hope you're not. We deal with life on an individual basis and the more you isolate yourself in your prison of self esteem as being 'better' than your associates, watch out that you don't stray alone into foreign country.

I had been told that the movie "Straw Dogs" was a violent movie and had purposely avoided seeing it until Friday night when it was presented at Oller Hall for the economically feasible cost of fifty cents. I got my monies worth and a little over the edge of the cup. It is a mind warping flick. It was not a violent film. It was another day in our continuing lie that we have fabricated as being Life. In one brilliant scene after another we are introduced to a few Universal truths that we feared all along. If you tease those whom God has favored with strength you will get your neck broke or your body raped. If you pay money service to the Church: be assured the Old Boy Upstairs is aware of your contribution and the good to (sic) which it is being put. If you wander into a corridor of hell, do not be surprised that the people there are a different breed. The movie spells out with all the clarity of the Old Testament, that in a 'dog eat dog' world, sharpen your teeth.

Would be our Church fathers spoke in such adult language to us instead of 'gum dropping' us to our death with all this sweetness and light bull. Strip one of them naked and throw him out in the wilderness for a few days and then let us all gather to hear his next sermon.

It's an Old Testament world we're living in and "Straw Dogs" outlined a little of the requirements for survival when you find something in your Pablumed life worth fighting for.

talking to him after the show and was amazed to hear that he's only been playing the mandolin for three years and for Lester Flatt for one year! His presence on stage could only be likened to Olga Korbett at Munich. He won the crowd with everything he did.

Lester Flatt could only be described as Lester Flatt. Whether he was telling an anecdote about "The Beverly Hillbillies," or singing one of his many hit songs you could tell he had something special. He loves people and he loves Bluegrass. The crowd could sense this in everything he did. He was there to play and sing the music the crowd wanted. I don't think anyone came away feeling cheated.

Bluegrass is the type of music you either love or hate. The only people in Oller were the people who love Bluegrass. Lester Flatt and the Nashville Grass presented Bluegrass at its best.

On behalf of all the people who were present, I'd like to thank Mr. Bader and the people involved in the Homecoming concert selection for making this Homecoming concert a success in that all the people who were there had a damn good time. We're just sorry that everyone at J.C. doesn't like Bluegrass. If you weren't there you missed a great man and a great concert.

Indians Overcome Crusaders 14-3; Still Number 1 in Lambert Bowl

by Gary Gillen

With the large crowd of alumni and students on hand to see the powerful Indian squad in action, Juniata squeaked out a 14-3 victory over the surprising Crusaders from Susquehanna.

The defense again looked very sharp giving up only 3 points and this after a fumble deep in Juniata territory. From then on in the Indian defense proved to be too tough for the Crusaders. The Crusaders threatened time and time again as Gary Shope could not get the offense moving, forcing the defense to be on the field for much of the game. However; each time the defense rose to the occasion, stopping Susquehanna short. Interceptions by Steve Lehman and Dave Cortazzo were keys in halting the Crusader offense. The Indian offense on the other hand, looked flat and had everyone wondering "what's the matter" as the powerful Juniata offense was held scoreless in the first half. The first half was a real defensive battle as neither team could generate any real offense.

Finally in the second half, Juniata seemed to get it together and drove for its two touchdowns with Carmen DeFrancesco plowing in for the first score. A big play was the return of a punt by Rick Rudolf who took the ball at midfield and took it deep into the Crusader's territory. Lou Eckerl added the second score with Carmen adding the extra points.

So Juniata ran its record to a perfect 5-0. Juniata is also the top ranking team in the East in the Lambert Bowl voting, followed by F & M who beat Dickinson 37-16. It will be interesting to see if JC can keep its top ranking with its close victory this week.

This week Juniata plays another MAC opponent when it travels to Lycoming.

Gary Shope pulls back to pass in Saturday's game.

The young ladies cringe in fright as their pirate captors hold on to their most recent conquest in Gilbert and Sullivan's "Pirates of Penzance," to be held October 26 and 27 at 8:15 in Oller Hall.

Pirates Steal Show for Parents Weekend

by Sam Sirianni

Pirates, police, and pretty young maidens will grace the Oller Hall stage when the Juniata College Concert Choir presents Gilbert and Sullivan's "Pirates of Penzance" at 8:15 P.M. on Friday and Saturday evenings, October 26 and 27. This laugh-filled production will be featured as a highlight of Juniata's '73 Parent's Weekend.

Phillip Woodworth, as the hero Frederic, is a young boy mistakenly apprenticed to a band of pirates until his 21st birthday. The apprenticeship began after his nurse, played by Betsy Shuss, misunderstood the word "pilot" to mean "pirate". As the story opens, Frederic, his indentures up, Prepares to leave and devote himself to the extermination of piracy. At this point Major General Stanley, played by Dr. Richard Hunter, who is a professor here at Juniata, and his wards, played by Anna Puma, Marjorie Loving, Wendy Hackman, Jean Jarrow, and Cricket Smith, arrive and are seized by the pirates. They are eventually released by the Pirate King, Mark Stafford, after he discovers that the Major General is an "orphan".

The second act brings together a most extraordinary set of circumstances. The Major General's guilt is discovered that he was lying about being an "orphan boy". The revelation that poor Frederic's birthday is on February 29th, making him actually 5¼ years old, the pirate's desire for revenge against the Major General, and Frederic's unwavering sense of duty, all create an enjoyable, satiric look at opera. It all comes to a conclusion as the police, led by Terry Tomassetti, come to the rescue, and the pirates yield to the happy ending of marriage.

Bruce Hirsch, director of the Concert Choir, will conduct the production. Stage direction is by Marjorie Hirsch, with Doris Goehring as technical director and Ronald Shafer, who was in charge

Student Government Votes For Impeachment of Nixon

by Alice Boomhower

This may very well be my last article as well as my first. I guess that it could be said that this is my first editorial.

At the last Student Government meeting a resolution was passed to support the ACLU's (American Civil Liberties Union) effort to pressure Congress to initiate impeachment proceedings against President Nixon. This will be done by letters sent to Bud Shuster, representative from this district to the House of Represenatives. Also a letter will be sent to the ACLU informing them of our decision. In addition to this an individual letter writing campaign will be initiated.

The vote for this measure was unanimous with three abstentions.

This vote came as a result of Nixon's refusal to hand over his Watergate tapes. As of last Friday-Nixon's time had run out to either hand over the tapes or appeal his case to the Supreme Court. Because of his decision to do nothing, he may be cited for contempt of court. This is at the very least a misdemeanor.

In addition to his refusal to hand over the tapes, Student Government feels that Nixon has also made serious mistakes in that:

1. He has admittedly taken government funds for improvement of his property. This he claims was done for security reasons.
2 There are hints of deals with ITT and Dairy companies.
3 Nixon's connection with Watergate has been questioned.
4 It is possible that secret bombings of Cambodia are unconstitutional.

However. I question the morality of Student Government being able to speak for the Juniata campus on issues of national importance. We are a campus with varying ideas and interests, and I honestly don't feel that all students support the impeachment proceeding. Secondly, none of us were aware of this vote being taken in the Senate, if we had known, I wonder how large a meeting it would have been. Thirdly, like it or not, Student Government speaks for this campus. Letters may say Student Government supports . . . . but this body is still speaking for the total campus. We are not a large body like the United States that could only work efficiently (on important issues) with a representative body. We are a small campus and if something important comes up, how about some feedback from students before the fact, not after.

WJC Requests Assistance

If you have a few minutes to spare, please do not let the tremendous length of this article score you. It's very important and does not just concern the radio station.

There was one big error in the Juniatian, (Oct. 4, or whatever) we do not suffer from student apathy. We have 150 students at the radio station already and they are by no means apathetic. We (or at least I, the Program Director and a Student Government Senator) do not believe that Juniata students are totally apathetic. I understand some are athletes, despite being burdened with the school's tough academic standards e.g. we don't offer them "Basketweaving" or "Advanced Badminton" like some big schools), some are determined to be excellent doctors, lawyers, educators, etc. They may really not have the time to donate to extra-curricular activities. I do believe, however, that there are 300 students among the 1200 who can at least give the radio station 1½ hours a week, and maybe not even "that much". I don't know why, but I have an insane notion that there might be 100 students in the student body with responsibility (which is sufficient to run the station themselves). Now you know what the sign said, "100 positions open". We have found at least 40 honest, hardworking students. If we have a staff of 300 "apathetic" students, we may find those remainding 60 students. If we can't, then we sure and hell won't automatically give up.

In case you're wondering, "responsibility" is being on time for your show, at least five minutes before, (maximum), whether you have Monday 11-12:30 or Saturday 5-7 (p.m.), you are responsible for telling the Chief Announcer if you can't make a show, instead of doing nothing and let the other d.j. wait 20 minutes before a replacement is found. We also want a highly responsible student who will do Tuesday morning 6:30-9:00 without fail! If the d.j. happens to oversleep and some students have a test at 8:00 a.m. and miss it, they'll probably lynch the Program Director, never set their alarms again for WJC, or buy a different kind of alarm clock. You wonder why we're not on the air? That should never happen and we're going to be sure such incident never occurs.

When the radio station is finally ready (at least 85%, we're presently only about 60% ready, if you wonder what I base those percentages on, see me.) programming wise, not engineering wise, I'll then ask Station Manager Jim Pye and he'll give the okay, on mayben suggest we go on earlier anyway. We are going to be sure that every last student dollar invested in the statiion will be well worth it. We are not going to have something which is not going to be worthwhile in the end.

I am sick and tired of everybody blaming Dave Hoover (our Chief Engineer) for our troubles. He has no staff to help him. We can't afford a consulting 1st/Class Chief Engineer who works for $250 (a day and expenses) to hook our transmitters legally, so we don't get a fine from the FCC for $1000. The transmitters in each dorm will be hooked up "legally" in due time; way before we're ready Program-wise. Forgive me, I too. have to be a student every now and them, hence the slowness on my part.

I'm surprised when people think "radio shows" are "positions". What's the sense of having a 150 d.j.'s if you only have one engineer? For each d.j., we will also need one person working "behind the scenes"

Artist Floyd Here For Ten Days

Division I's first visiting artist-scholar will be Virginia Hastings Floyd, formerly Professor of Speech at the University of Arizona, at present Administrative Director of the future Southwestern School for the Performing Arts. A member of Phi Beta Kappa, she has been awarded three Danforth Teaching Fellowships and a University Fellowship. Author of The Craft/Process of Interpretation (Bobbs Merrill), she is also a co-editor of Studies in Interpretation with Esther M. Doyle. At present Dr. Floyd is working on a text for interpretation as well as doing Theatre in the United States.

Dr. Floyd arrived at Juniata on October 21 and will be here for ten days. On Monday, October 22, she participated in a panel discussion on Beckett with Larry Riggs, Ralph Church and Glenn Gress. She also read from a prose work of Beckett. During the week, Dr. Floyd will work in literature and interpretation classes as well as with a freshman seminar. She will also give an interpretive reading of Flannery O'Connor's "Revelation" for Modes of Thought. During the week of October29, she will be a participant in the Colloquy on Vocation.

What In The World Is There To Do?

by Mike Houck

There is one question which all of us must face at one time or another; what should I do with my life? To attempt to help us sort out our feelings on this subject the college is sponsoring a "Vocations Colloquy." Students will have an opportunity to talk with people in varied vocations and receive an understanding of all the aspects involved in each occupation. The colloguy is scheduled for October 30th, 31st, and November 1st and it will be possible to talk privately or in a group with any of the participants representing their individual field. A wide range of professionals are promised including those in business, law, medicine, science, journalism, politics, archeology, education, communications, the arts, professional sports, and religion.

The purpose of the colloquy is not only to allow the student to receive factual information concerning the work but to attempt to show the different lifestyles certain vocations require and the adjustments needed when entering an occupation. It is expected that the colloquy will let each student see the total view of an occupation and show him that a vocation does affect his personal life. Some of the scheduled participants have chosen rather normal lifestyles while others are experimenting with new forms of living such as communes.

These first two areas of concern should help the student to decide on the problem of choosing a line of work that is meaningful and useful. It is considered important to most people to do something in their life that is interesting and helpful to others and the colloquy attempts to provide a way to judge different vocations from discussions with people who are involved with it.

Included in this Colloquy will be James Barefoot a rural physician who initiated a rural medical clinic to give health services for families living in the sticks. This is one of three like it in the country. Patricia Moe is one of two women serving as a policewoman for the state of Pennsylvania. Chris Moore, who operates a Philadelphia collective (somewhat like a commune). He also runs the "Movement For New Society" a group interested in non-violent social change.

James Poling is a minister, organic farmer, and housekeeper who will also be here for the Colloquy. Joseph Werse, will also make an appearance. He is the national representative for Sears and Robuck Retailing and Merchandise.

Letters to the Editor

Letters to the editor should be addressed to: Editor, The Juniatian, Box 867, Juniata College, Huntingdon, Pa. 16652. The editors reserve the right to print only non-libelous and responsible content and to edit all letters and commentaries submitted to The Juniatan. The staff also reserves the right to publish all full signatures unless the writer can supply valid reason for omitting his name.

In reaction to Henry's editorial in the last issue, I would just like to mention one point.

It seems to me a foul ball when an editorialist has to use degrading nouns instead of the President's name, and describe him with such a vague term that he is unable to attack the policy of the President and must turn to "attacking the man."

Note that this letter is not about the policy change desired by the President, but the way in which it was written. I think the written media on campus should have learned from the gross mistake the Student Government made when they created their course evaluation books. Instead of printing only the facts they had to add a list of personal degrading adjectives in Professor Blaisdel 's evaluation. These two men, the Professor and the President, and a million others deserve our respect and not our ridicule. I'm not saying that we need to agree with their actions or policies all the time, but we should respect the position they hold. After all, we are only the students who are learning to take over the positions of these men and others of their generation.

An editorial is a place for one man's personal opinion, and in this case, the topic chosen was good. But if an editor cannot base his argument entirely on the policy being discussed, and must turn to 'attacking the man"; then this person should give up the editorialist and become a satirist.

Phil Kimmel

What does Dave Andrews mean when he states "the Juniatian provides immediacy to the campus concerning various past and future activities". I see no difference in reading about a football game six weeks ago or four days ago. I bring this up because the radio station could give the students even more immediacy — split second. When a game's completed, we can quickly do a quick wrap-up and broadcast it repeatedly within a 24-hour period, staying way ahead of the written media by four days. If our basketball team is battling for a championship as far away, say Philadelphia, I take it not too many students can tag along. The radio station could broadcast the game back to campus. But, the radio station is not allowed to do so. Why? I hope there are good reasons because I can find none to give to students, let alone our Sports Staff.

Henry Siedzikowski claims he is having problems because students are apathetic. How about taking into consideration if the student wishes to write? If many had a burning desire to write (whether they acquired this "desire" through the Writing Program or not) I guess they would flock to the newspaper. Is it really due to "apathetic" students?

In conclusion, I feel students

Once again, it appears that the students have become the victims of a "shaft". Late last year the Student Government, after many requests from students, formally requested lights for the intramural fields and the tennis courts adjacent to Ellis Hall. Now it appears that this student requests will be abandoned without sufficient justification.

This request for lights is not an outrageous proposition. On the contrary, the participation of the student body in the intramural program over the past year since its revision prove that this suggestion warrants approval. Over 60% of the student body (overlap of activities computed into this figure) participated in the intramural program under the leadership of Coaches Rossi and Reilly. There were 13,452 individual entries by students last year, an incredible

After Watergate, most people had become tired of paying attention to national politics. Even the unusual seemed to become humdrum. Political activists searched mostly in vain for some way to rouse the citizentry. Fortunately, the Nixon administratiion came to the rescue. By pulling some of the most outlandish stunts of all time, they again have people wondering just how low they can take the country.

The object of Mr. Nixon's latest series of kamakazi-like attacks is the American system of Justice. A rather unlikely target for a former law and order man, but a target just the same.

The first shots were fired by Mr. Nixon's "trusty" old ex-hatchet man, Mr. Spiro Agnew. By working out his deal, he set a precedent for the punishment of high government officials that is already having repercussions. Former Representative Irving Wallace, from this district was convicted on several counts of mail fraud and other illegal financial dealings. Last week, he pleaded the "Agnew Precedent" in asking for a lighter sentence. This Agnew deal, in retrospect, looks as if it made the major factor in allowing Mr. Nixon to spend the rest of his days in luxurious San Clemente instead of a state or federal penitentiary somewhere.

Beyond that, Mr. Agnew made a further mockery of the type of standards the American people should expect from their elected officials when he reaffirmed his innocence after pleading "no contest"! His statement that he was innocent, but considering the "post Watergate morality", he might have committed illegal and unethical acts, is a farce. He is boldly saying that politicians only have to obey the law when there's danger of getting caught. And finally, to add insult to injury, he states that he did it all in the name of patriotism.

The second bombshell came more recently with the firing of Archibald Cox, the resignation of Elliot Richardson and the firing of the Deputy Attorney General. This fiasco was made necessary when Cox refused to drop the court battle to gain the Nixon tapes. Since this move is going to look very bad on the President's public record, we almost have to assume that Mr. Nixon needs to hide those tapes at any cost. It is also in direct defiance of the two lower courts which ruled against Nixon. The obvious conclusion seems to be that Mr. Nixon knew he could not win the case in court, so he simply got rid of the man opposing him. This type of thing is in dictatorships, but until recently was not a normal process in this country. We all have to hope this is not the beginning of a trend.

Finally, just to spice things up, Mr. Nixon has proven how poor a memory he has. Less than one year after we "ended" our tragic mistake in Vietnam, Mr. Nixon is now entangling us in another war. The mere thought of sand dunes replacing the rice paddies has to raise concern in even the most apathetic.

The only answer to all this seems to be the initiation of impeachment precedings. Unfortunately, gross incompetencies like the Mideast intervention are not grounds for impeachment. However, Mr. Nixon has been kind enough to supply Congress and the American people with the needed ammunition. Now it's up to us.

As you might know, the ACLU is now providing a funneling serviice for all concerned American citizens to put pressure on their Congressmen to begin the necessary procedures. Juniata's Student Senate passed a resolution backing this movement at their last meeting. They are now trying to start a letter writing campaign to give

The two albums "Hollywood Dream" and "Previous Convictions", are linked by the appearance of John "Speedy" Keen on both. Speedy was leader/drummer/singer /songwriter for Thunderclap Newman the group who colaborated with producer (then) Peter Townsend and released "Hollywood Dream", which is now available as a re-issue. The recently released "Previous Convictions" is Speedy's first solo effort, where he presumably produces and plays all of the instrumentals on the album.

Not suprisingly, both of these albums are texturally similar — both convey a curiously pleasant nostalgic mood—obviously a product of Speedy's strange falsetto-like voice. This, coupled with sparse but complete arrangements and the rather seething but subdued guitar work (if you can believe that possible), makes both albums a sheer delight for the listener.

"Hollywood Dream" is everything anyone could expect (and hope for) of a rock album. Along with the Kink's "Arthur" and the Move's "Shazam", it remains one of the forgotten masterpieces.

Despite the fact that Thunderclap Newman is comprised of only three musicians, a huge assortment of instruments is used— everything from electric kazoo to saxaphone. "Accidents" best exemplifies the group's talent in this respect. Dylan's "Open the Door, Homer" is beautifully rearranged with the chorus line being changed to "Open the Door, Richard", obviously to provide a more contempory meaning. "Wild Country" is another fine cut, but "Something in the Air", the closing song, is particularly outstanding; with its searing lead guitar and subtle use of strings.

"Previous Convictions" continues in the same vein. It has less impact than "Hollywood Dream" because it is merely a collection of songs that do not have thematic unity (e.g. "Sgt. Pepper's"), as does "Hollywood Dream." It's still a fine album though.

The inclusion of "Positively 4th Street" will probably evoke responses of "Oh! Come On!" or "Oh! Shit, not another one!"

Given one listen, however, all doubt should be relieved. With its acoustic based arrangement and floating organ, along with Speedy's distinctive vocal, "4th Street" here sounds much less bitter than Dylan's version.

"Old Fashioned Girl", like "Wild Country" on the "Hollywood" LP, is a call to the past." The chorus line Take me back to the old ways. . . The old days." is supported by some expensive guitar. "Somethin' Else" is a "Long Tall Sally" type rocker complete with a thundering piano reminiscent of Jerry Lee Lewis.

"The Flying Wino" and "Lesliana" are two short instrumental excursions: the former a biting guitar "solo", and the latter being a strange organ piece sounding like its eminating from a revolving speaker.

In "Keep Your Head Down", Speedy denouces revolution— a

One of the problems of being dead is that people keep trying to dig you up and move the body to a safer place. Just about the time the old bones have begun to settle down into a comfortable position and grass has covered the plot, then I'll be damned if some ghoulish prankster doesn't come, set up a projection screen in the cemetary and start showing a home movie of America's Sweetheart 'Linda Lovelace'. The next thing you know they'll be setting up Kleig lights and having cadaver roasts.

If you haven't seen the skin flick "Deep Throat", don't bother waiting for the Second Coming, you are here. But for the rest of us who still pet the flesh every now and then with a sweetmeat of temptation, this modern day cartoon has served us with a wealth of Drano for cleansig our clogged souls. Of more value than a duodecimality of Sunday School sermons, "Deep Throat" takes us out of the closets of our minds and onto the bedsheets of reality.

The movie sickens the heart but so does a trip to New York, if you care about humanity. The movie makes the flesh impotent but so does an epidemic of venereal complaints. In no way can I see that the movie causes either harm or evil. It does however rub your face in the excreta of our preoccupation with self gratification.

Another movie concerned with our fantasy image of this being the 'best of all possible worlds' is "Heavy Traffic" by the adorable kid who gave us that feel thy peecture "Fritz the Cat". Unlike "Fritz" which tended to be a little out of date like those 1930 photos of New York City by Berenice Abbott, "Heavy Traffic" zero's in on life in old Manhattan as it is survived in by today's youth. Garbage, sex, murder, family life in all it's endearing moments, and the rational of day by day wonder at Life. Now, you may be thinking that in no way are either these movies or their subject related to you or your little plot of ground. Wrong! Anything concerned with the business of being human or inhuman (as is more often the case) has property rights on your attention.

The abdication of personal responsibility for what's happening in the world outside does not begin with recognition that your morals are different from everyone else's but with the selfish concept that yours are superior.

Once this is established you go about the dreary business of protecting yours and your'n by setting yourself up as a standard of behavior for everyone elst and trying to censor anything that threat-

Open Letter Addresses Student Body: JC Students Lack Political Awareness

As of late, articles of a uolitical nature have been posted in the cafeteria lines for public viewing. These articles, sharing space, if only briefly, with news of the Rolling Stones and Soap Box Derby, were editorials regarding the unanswered all egations made against President Nixon by John Dean and the current state of freedom of the press in our country, and a full page advertisement in the New York Times paid for by the A.C.L.U., calling for the impeachment of President Nixon. These postings, undertaken by concerned students, independent of any student organization, are controversial. They were posted in order to provoke reactions among the seeming majority of Juniata Students who remain ignorant of, and aloof to, the controversies which are shaping the destiny of this land. Unfortunately, the reactions provoked by these articles have had a dismal familiarity. Seemingly few students have paid attention to anything more than the headlines. Without exception, these postings have been removed within twenty-four hours of their being put on display. One article was taken to the office of Student Government, where the furious student who tore it down demanded, in between obscenities, to know where the article came from and why it had been posted.

Such actions are hardly fitting for students; curiosity is a prime virtue of those who wish to learn. Such actions are not the actions of responsible, voting citizens; those who wish to govern themselves must do all that is within their power to learn the truth behind the headlines and act accordingly. Finally, such actions are not the actions of those who wish to remain free; freedom is based on the unrestrained dissemination and discussion of facts and ideas. We are eligible voters; we must be politically awake and responsible. To insure that we are free, we must find the truth, no matter how painful a path we travel in its acquisition. To remain free we must fight for freedom with all our energy, all our hearts.

You are involved, like it or not.

Become politically aware. Expose yourself to opinions contrary to your own and test opinions in argument. Rebut those who oppose you, don't just ignore or chatize. The flowing of ideas is a current in which we all must swim if we are to remain self-governing and free. If we fail in our duties as students, or citizens, as free people, we have only failed one another.

Sincerely,
John Varner

Supernatural Haunts Ellis Hall Ballroom Wednesday

On Wednesday, October 24th, at 8:00 P.M. in the Ballroom of Ellis Hall there will be an illustrated lecture on "Ghosts, Whichcraft, and Demons" by Ed and Lorraine Warren.

The Warrens, both professional artists, began their investigations into paranormal activities (or hauntings) 27 years ago. Ed Warren's first exposure to the world of the occult was at the age of five when his family moved into a house that was haunted. Lorraine Warren has been clairvoyant since she was a child, and with time and awareness has developed into a light transmedium.

To quote the Warrens:

"When we bring a case to you, we are 99% sure that it is genuine paranormal activity. We have worked with psychiatrists, doctors, priests, ministers and mediums in all of the case histories. We do not for one minute think we can convince you of the reality of the supernatural world but we do hope to make some of you curious enough to want to study it. We investigate and report to you what we have found. . .but as to why these things happen, we leave this to the parapsychologists.

The only thing we ask is that you try to keep an open mind, for this is the only way new truths can be discovered."

complete reversal from the pro-revolution "Something In the Air" on "Hollywood Dream." That's the Way It Is" and "Keep Off the Grass" are fine rockers, while "Aires Lady" slows the pace a bit.

When it comes to it, there's not one disappointing track on either "Hollywood Dream" or "Previous Convictions." These two albums represent some of the most pleasant music I've heard in quite a while. Since Speedy's material dominates both albums, and if this is what we can come to expect of him, I'm already waiting for the next Speedy Keen album. So why not get into these two albums? Many hours of listening pleasure will be the reward.

each student the chance to speak out on the future of America.

The focus is now on us. If we speak out we can force Mr. Nixon to stand trial for his actions. If we keep quiet, we will simply watch the country continue in the direction it's now heading. The choice is ours. For the sake of all of us, and future generations, I hope a large number of us find the guts to speak out.

Upcoming Movies Initiate Conflicting Student Reviews

There was once an ancient Greek myth about a sculptor named Pygmalion who made a statue of a beautiful woman, whom he named Galatea. However, the hapless hero fell in love with his creation. Out of pity for the poor peon, the love goodness Aphrodite brought the statue to life.

The English playwright George Bernard Shaw, used this myth as the basis for his excellent satire on middle-class morality and cold-hearted scientific empiricism, which he called, surprisingly, Pygmalion. The play depicted a cold phonetics professor named Henry Higgins, who molds a lowly flower girl named Eliza Doolittle into a "lady of fashion." He accomplishes this by teaching her to talk "genteel," treating her in as brutal a fashion as possible, regarding any feelings she may have in the matter as in-

Unfortunately, in the 1950's, Lerner and Loewe destroyed the idea completely by having the audacity to make a musical out of it, called, God forbid, My Fair Lady!! While it is possible to make satirical musical comedies, as evidenced in recent years by Company and A Little Night Music, Lerner and Loewe are exponents of the philosophy that states a musical comedy is a musical comedy if and only if its hero and heroine end the play in a romantic embrace, or at least some unreasonable facsimile of such. While this theory is a ginger-peachey-keen in such sacchainely milksopish endeavors such as Brigadoon, it wreaks profound havoc with Shavian satire. The idea of Eliza going back to Higgins in the end simply because "she understands" his offensively boorish male chauvinism is disgustingly nauseating. (and from a pompous male chauvinist like myself, that is a surprising sentiment.) Not only do the "authors" throw in this contrived and ridiculous ending, but, in the rest of the play, they have no original dialogue of their own. They translate Shaw's dialogue verbatim, throwing in their inane songs whenever there is something to sing about. This gives the whole mess a superficial plagiarism completely destroying any serious or satiric comment evident in the original play.

I suppose, since these reviews are supposedly designed to attract customers, I should start being nice to the film. Admittedly, I haven't seen it yet, but I have read My Fair Lady, and, except for such excellent films such as Cabaret, musicals are not adapted to the medium of film, merely translated into one more or less permanent production of the show. This is especially true in the case of Lerner and Loewe. But, now for some nice things about the film. Probably the best asset is Rex Harrison's virtuoso performance as Henry Higgins (This is worth the 25¢ admission fee if nothing else is). Mr. Harrison has played the part so often and with such excellence in both My Fair Lady and Pygmalion that he has virtually become identified with the role. All others who have played the part are allegedly either downright poor or cheap imitations. As for Audrey Hepburn's performance as Eliza, the general opinion seems to go from "perfect" to "downright poor," so it's difficult to make a judgment without seeing the film. There is a general consensus of opinion, through that she is the weakest before her "transformation."

Despite its many faults, I suppose My Fair Lady is still quite entertaining, simply because it is a musical. (If you don't believe me, ask Terry Tomasetti who has played Alfred Doolittle in his long acting career.) However, if you are looking for any seriousness or even cutting wit in this adaptation (corruption??), you can forget it. It will be shown in Alumni Hall twice this weekend — Thursday at 8:00 pm and Sunday afternoon at 1:00 pm. Enjoy!

"My Fair Lady" is surely one of the lovliest films ever made. Based on the George Bernard Shaw play "Pygmalion," this movie is equally witty and elegant with just a bit more romance added.

The basic story, which everyone must know, concerns a bet made between Professor Henry Higgins (Rex Harrison) and Colonel Pickering (Wilfred Hyde-White). Higgins bets Pickering that he can turn a lowly, common flower girl into a charming woman simply by changing her speech habits. Audrey Hepburn play Eliza Doolittle, the squashed cabbage leaf" whom Higgins hopes to turn into a princess. All of the performances are great but especially memorable is Stanley Holloway's portrayal of Eliza's father, Alfred Doolittle — a man of complete moral integration (and a role which is also in the repertoire of J.C.'s own Terry Tomassetti as his former seminar-mates know). Rex Harrison's Henry Higgins is just too super-cool for words and Audrey Hepburn makes the change from cockney peasant to stylish lady with ease.

The music by Alan J. Lerner and Frederik Lowe is all fitting and clever, from the well-known standards "On the Street Where You Live" and "I Could Have Danced All Night" to the lesser known but very witty and very appropriate "Show Me" and "Without You." Rex Harrison manages his songs in a sort of syncopated talk-style which has gotten him through many musicals His songs are mostly satirical comments on women ("A Hymn to Him" and "Let A Woman in Your Life") and people in general ("Why Can't the English?" But he blends just the proper amounts of sarcasm and affection in the beautiful "I've Grown Accustomed to Her Face." Stanley Holloway does his songs with perfect devil-may-care abandon, especially in "Get Me to the Church on Time." Audrey Hepburn lip-synes to Marni Nixon's "loverly" voice which seems sort of cheating but it all blends together rather nicely.

The photography is fantastic and the choreography is delightful. The whole film, from beginning to end, is just sheer joy. I have seen it three times so far and am looking forward to seeing it a fourth.

This is the first and only musical of this term's series of Academy Award Winners will be shown in Alumni Hall on Thursday, October 25 at 8:00 pm and again on Sunday, October 28 at 1:00 pm.

Intramural Football Teams Battle In Weekly Playoffs

by Jaime Belmont

Look's like it's going to be a "fight to the finish" in the men's intramural football league between The Ant Hill Mob of Emmert House, Dubois House from Flory, The Ratzas from first floor Tussey, and The Panama Red's from Long. These four teams will battle for the title in the playoffs this week. It's been a long tough season for men's touch football, and the league has been narrowed down from the starting eleven teams.

Who will pull it off?

Perhaps The Ratzas's with their gutty defense Myron Zimmerman, Dave Skoner, and Wally Prozialack, who make going through the line like hitting a brick wall. The quarterback Milton Knouse passing to end John Diner, with his quick catlike moves, are not about to give up the title easily. Captain Done Stone is sure of that. First floor Tussey is looking for a victory.

The competition is going to be rough, but exciting. Everybody is invited to come watch and cheer for their favorite team. Behind Ellis Wednesday and Thursday of this week at about 5:30, bring a blanket and a friend.

JC Streamrolling for MAC Title

by Keith Hartman

Juniata's rugged defense once again saved the day, holding a spirited Lycoming team to just a field goal, as J.C. clubbed the Warriors 27-3 on Lycoming's field.

The game at first looked as if it was going to be a rout, with Juniata's meatgrinder offense taking it in on the opening series. Gary Shope culminated the seven minute drive with a beautiful pass to Lou Eckerl for the TD. However, the point after failed, and that proved to be the end of the scoring for Juniata in the first half as several untimely turnovers stalled two potential scoring drives.

The second half was definitely all Juniata though, with defensive back Jim Messener starting things off by taking an intercepted pass and returning it 33 yards down the sideline for the score. Once again, the point after failed, as Juniata led 12-3.

The Indian's weren't satisfied though, and starting on the 42-yard line, Juniata drove again. Several key first down rushes by Lou Eckerl and Carmen DeFrancesco plus a great pass reception by Greg Kennedy, put the ball on the one-yard line where Lou Eckerl proceeded to bull over for his second touchdown of the day. This time, Shope elected to try for the to Carmen DeFrancesco was good, two-point conversion. His pitch-out making the score 20-3.

Freshman Dave Wickerowski then took over the reins, leading J.C. down the field for yet another score. Bob Cunion's TD and Dave Cortazzo's kick made the final score 27-3.

Juniata thus ran its seasonal record to 6-0, and won its 9th straight game. Our win, plus Franklin and Marshall's 21-20 loss to Widener should make thing interesting in the Lambert Bowl voting.

To the editor:

Over the last few weeks I have spoken to a multitude of students who have expressed a wide range of opinions concerning Watergate and Nixon's alleged involvement, some venting rage, others disdain, but the majority of the people seem to feel an overpowering sense of dismay or indifference. President Nixon on the preceding weekend has moved our country into a position where people can no longer live within a enclave of apathy and unconcern.

What Mr. Nixon has attempted to do is subvert the proceedings of the Justice Department against those involved in Watergate. First he tried to have Elliott Richardson submit to his bidding by requesting him to fire special prosecutor Cox, but Richardson, being the 'honorable" person he is, refused and thus reesigned. Nixon then went to the second in command, Deputy Attorney General Ruckelshaus who also refused, but instead of being able to resign, he was fired. Reaching further down into the barrel Nixon finally found U.S. Solicitor General Bork, comparable in eminence with Gerald Ford. What does this mean to us, students at Juniata? It means that bit by bit as Senator it means the impeachment of one Birch Bayh has so eloquently spoken we will lose our Constitutional rights. We are witnesses to one of America's greatest tenets, the search for truth and justice vis-a-vis the Judicial system, fading into obscurity. Now is the time to decide what we as citizens want from our country and its institutions, for tomorrow we may have no choice.

This may be tired cliche, but I am proud to be an American; if man to retain the sense of integrity and virtue which I believe our country to symbolize, then all of us should support to the utmost our student Government's action of backing the American Civil Liberties Union's resolution for the impeachment of Richard M. Nixon.

Thank you,
Tom Curtz

Sports Stumpin'

by Gary Gillen

I guess its kind of late to state my impressions of the sports scene here at Juniata but then again its a new column and I can do whatever I want, so here goes. From the way things have started off looks like this may be the year of the Indian in college sports. Not much more can be said for the football team, a perfect 6-0 record and number 1 standing in the East certainly can stand well for the teams progress. The outcome of the next two games with Wilkes and Westminster could show just how strong JC is and possibly push them up to bigger and better things. Enough for football. Cross Country has come along fine and with the exceptional running of Greg Ransome has led Juniata to a 4-3 record. This year we had the introduction of a new sport here, Women's Field Hockey. It is an intresting sport to watch as the girls take on teams from the surrounding areas.

Well enough for the fall sports we should see an improvement in the quality of athletics this winter. One good thing about an all freshman starting basketball team is that this year they are all back. This year's squad with a year's college experience and some added attractions in new freshmen and transfer should be solid and with a little luck could be among the contenders.

Wrestling, well we can't get any worse! This year the team is pretty much the same as last but with a year's more experience should be respectable. Its really not fair to expect a title from the wrestlers as they really don't get any help in that usually we only have 1 man in a class which makes it tough to even practice. Girls Basketball has always done well and this year should be no exception. Much of the talent is back. (Doesn't it seem strange that we always have most of the teams back? What happens to the upperclassmen?) So winter looks like it could be an exciting season.

Now when we come to the spring it appears this may be Title Time. The Golf team has been contenders for the last 2 years and again most of the team is back. I see no reason why it should change this year. Mr. Berrier has brought along quite a baseball team with last year's season ending with a trip to the ECAC tournament. Six of the starters are back and the pitching is pretty solid. Another year's experience should only help the Indian baseball squad. With the title talk going around campus about football everyone seems to have forgotten that just last spring we had an MAC title, the Track Team. The team took it all last year and appears to be just as strong this year. Cordetti and Timcavage are gone but some good looking freshman should fill in and JC should be the class team in the MAC's again.

So looking to the coming year it appears that JC has some bright spots coming up. Everywhere it seems that the Indians have a good chance and should hold their own in MAC competition.

Hopefully this new column will be a weekly thing. I am open to suggestions or will leave it open to you if you feel you have something to say. If so drop by the newpaper office with your thoughts.

(e.g., engineers, traffic managers, campus bulletins, community bulletins, news staff, sports staff, public information directors, and countless administrative assistants.) To date, we can still fill 100 (or 150) positions. All you have to do is want to help; we're the ones who'll find something for you. The radio station should be a springboard and/or focal point of student activity (I know many will disagree, so, set me if you get a chance). After the radio station finally runs itself, we'll then send them to the newspaper, magazine, concert committee or to any organization which needs assistance. I'm glad to hear that the Yearbook staff is doing very well, they may not need help from us. After you have students getting together in one area, they may develop some kind of initiative TO GET things done in other areas (notice the word "may"). I do not believe in 1200 apathetic Juniata Students, I just hope there are 200 reliable people. If we cannot find at least fifty; I will then give up everything I worked so hard to establish on this campus. I'll become only a student and get my "good education" (if all I already put in wasn't an education in itself for the field of Communications). I would hate to see everything on this campus simply disintegrate.

Along Muddy Run—

figure for a school of this size. However, only a few games could be played in each of the spring and fall sports because of darkness limitations.

Likewise, tennis is one of the fastest growing sports in America. The tennis courts here are constantly crowded, especially in the spring when the tennis team occupies the courts for most of the available light hours and the rest of the students are left waiting.

One now asks, what happened? It's not easy to find out why funds weren't appropriated. Even E. Howard Hunt might have a hard time tracing the fate of this request.

However, the request was put in the budget in a "if funds available" category. Students were told that the Trustees would make the final decision at their fall meeting. At this point, the "shaft" job can be detected. This item was not even brought before the Trustees by the administration at the Building and Grounds Committee meeting until a student representative mentioned the matter. No action was taken, and consequently the request is dead for another year.

College Controller, Floyd Roller, says there were insufficient funds because of a lower enrollment. Yet, the projected admission figure was 360 freshmen this year. Surprisingly, 377 freshmen were enrolled at the beginning of the year, a solid figure compared to other similar colleges.

Furthermore, if we are going to attract more students in the future, Juniata will need better facilities for extracurricular activities. Elizabethtown College recently completed a new field house with a summming pool. But we are only asking for lights, which would have totallead $16,000 — an "extravagant request..

After all this Bureaucratic process, the students don't get their lights. We are told surveys are being taken now concerning the costs of the projects. So one must tell himself that favorite retreatist statement, maybe I'll see them when I come back to Juniata as an Alumnus."

VOL. XLVII NO. 5 | Juniata College — Huntingdon, Pa. 16652 | OCTOBER 31, 1973

Tony Martuzas barks at buyers as he auctions off Frosh for slaves.

Prices Placed On Students' Heads At Yearly Freshman Slave Auction

by C. Auguste Dupin

It was the first slave auction I had ever attended and I must say that it was a greater display of horror and vileness than I had ever dreamed possible.

It was held on a dungeon-like Hall which one enters at ground level. However, as one moves closer to the front one goes deeper and deeper (what a matching of moral and physical worlds!) until reaching the main stage which must be several feet into the earth.

The room was quite well lit, for this deed, foul as it was, had official sanction and did not need to be conducted in the shadows. The light was needed also for better examination of the "wares" for sale.

But the more I saw of those around me, the more I wished that the room would go dark. For the people were horrible to witness. The men were wild-eyed and desperate characters, trembling with an unholy excitement, while the women — I blush to admit that there were some among the buyers — were of the degraded class one expects to see in the colleges.

The auctioneer came out upon the stage eventually and attempted without success to establish some order. Watching this man alternately rouse and sooth the beast-like crowd all evening I was terrified and realized just how close to sheer chaos the Hall really was.

Finally a vast door swung open and the auction began, as slaves were brought out and lined up for all to see. The crowd showered the terrified freshman with cheers and catcalls, each one worthy of a lunatic. Each slave, man and woman wore a number, apparently their names having been taken with their freedom.

They were sent off then, and the first group (five girls) was brought back in. The bidding for these poor women was horrible to witness. The purchasers, mere boys, many of them, roared in competion, the entire bidding imbued with coarse joviality.

But more ghastly, more hideous than that were the women who bid for the men. Here the battles waged even fiercer, the prices higher and the shouting from the women — I can hardly call them ladies — was most distressing to a moral man such as myself.

The buying and selling went on for more than an hour. I saw things I can barely stand to think about, much less, say. As one example. I saw a boyfriend and girlfriend split up and sold to different masters. My heart broke, and I turned to leave, but I feared the crowd.

And then — I saw her. Among the slaves, she stood out, a woman of great beauty. Her face was beyond description. Her jeans were exquisitely embroidered. I stared at her in disbelief, and suddenly the auctioneer had called her number! Bidding on her had begun! The next thing I knew I was shouting a bid at the top of my lungs. The mood of this horrible event was more infective than I had realized. I like to think I was moved to action by a desire not to have her sold to do menial work for one of those rogues, but I wish I could be sure this was my motive.

I grieve to admit what happened next, for I bullied, bluffed, and bidded my way to victory and when I marched to the stage to sign for my prize I was as proud as any of the monsters.

But later when I returned to my room, my brief triumph was long over and my spirit was crushed by my surrender to animalism. I made up my mind that when my slave

He has over fifty poems in print in a variety of magazines including Epoch, New: Canadian and American Poetry, Abraxas, Rainy Day, and the Intro series. New Legal Committee Offers Services To JC

Last spring a new set of Judicial Proceedings were initiated at Juniata College causing the establishment of the Legal Services Committee by the Student Government. This committee was established to aid and course the student if he should be indicted for any sort of violation either in Huntingdon or at Juniata. They offer legal counseling if desired by the student and if a lawyer is necessary, will aid the student in finding one to represent him. Occasionally, when the necessary funds are provided by the Student Government, they will hire the lawyer and pay the legal fees.

Under the new Judicial Proceedings, the student is now guaranteed certain rights which before now were nonexistent. The student has the choice of having his hearing before the Dean of Students or before the Judicial Board composed of four students, two members of the teaching faculty, and one member of the Dean of Students staff. The legal services Committee makes sure that the student is aware of his right and how to use them to his best advantage at his hearing. These are rights which every student at Juniata should be familiar with and they are:

1. The right to have his/her case processed without judicial delay.
2. The right to a speedy hearing.
3. Written notice of the charges and the regulations upon which the charges are based no less than 48 hours before the scheduled hearing.
4. Written notice of the time, place, and date of the hearing.
5. The right to be present at the hearing.
6. The right to testify on his/her own behalf.
7. The right to confront and cross-examine any witnesses appearing against him/her, to produce witnesses on his/her own behalf, and to present evidence.
8. The right to remain silent.
9. The right to be presumed innocent until proven guilty.
10. The right to be assisted in his/her defence by any member of the college community of his/her own choosing.
11. The right of appeal.

The Legal Services Committee is financed by the Student Government. They provide enough funds for the purchasing of several legal periodicals and journals, particularly those which deal with student versus administration indictments They now have complete records of each case involving students in a school situation so that there is a precedent established. This allows the committee to counsel the student from the most knowledgable standpoint.

The committee was initiated and headed by Dave Andrews and Tom Kurtz. As of last year the action members are Brent Humphrey, Paul Sosnowski, Donald Burkett, Tom Cross, Joe Grappone, Barb Kosik, Kandy Foust, Peggy Smeal, Bryon Anderson, Sherrie Allemang, Jon Muir, John Litka, and Steve Blazek. This year brought the addition of several new faces, including some freshmen. These people are Judy Huss, David McCarren, Elaine Joyce, Beth Simmons, Tim McManus, Mike MacKenzie, Steve Gretz, Bruce Moyer, and Doug Fauckner. Anyone interested in working on this committee, can contact Dave Andrews or Tom Kurtz.

"A Man For All Seasons" And "The Lost Weekend" End Academy Award Winners In Regular Series

by Stella

The recent Watergate scandals have served to confirm an idea which has long been the opinion of many people. This is, that there are very few men who achieve a high political office and still retain their moral scruples — assuming, of course, that they had some sort of scruples to begin with. It seems as if power and prestige are more important to these men than the idea of being true to themselves and to their country. 'Loyalty" to their president ranked much higher in their estimation, than loyalty to their country. So . . . we now find ourselves with an absolutely incredible shake-up in our government and with an incredible lack of faith in those that are left to run it. And where do we go from here.

Sir Thomas More was an exception to the rule that all politicians are corrupt. As advisor to the King, Henry VIII, he refused to condone the King's divorcing of Katherine of Aragon in order to marry Anne Boleyn. He was strong enough to stand up for both the law of the land and the law of God . . . and he consequently lost his head, quite literally. But he became a legend in English History and a saint in the Catholic Church.

Paul Scofield is Sir Thomas More, with both his sense of humor, and his sense of integrity intact. And Robert Bolt has brought alive the times and issues of England under Henry VIII in his screen adaption of his hit play, A Man For All Seasons. The film is perfection and Scofield is the main reason for it's brilliancy. We see Sir Thomas as a man loving life, yet willing to give it up if he cannot live it as he feels is honest. A man who is able to go to his death with no regrets, having done as much as he could and, being able to do no more, lest his life be taken from him, blaming no one and still believing in himself.

One honest man in a political system is bound to be beheaded. But two or three might have a chance. And ten or fifteen would have to win. Perhaps, those politicians who have been left in the wake of Watergate might take notice of Sir Thomas' behavior and mend their ways. They won't of course — no one thinks it's worthwhile being a saint, any more. But it's nice to be able to watch the recreation of the life of a truly honest and Holy (though Sir Thomas would have laughed to hear that word applied to himself) Man. The showing of A Man For All Seasons should be considered an occassion and everyone who can, should attend it.

This film, directed by Fred Zinneman, will be shown in Alumni Hall, Friday, November 2.

EDITORIAL

by Henry Siedzikowski

In the last issue of the Juniatian, two students took the time to write in and comment on two of previous editorials. In this issue, I would like to answer the questions they raised.

First was the "article" by Tony Martuzas on student apathy. Mr. Martuzas starts his article by saying I was in error when I stated the school suffered from student apathy. (What I did say was that the freshmen class was extremely apathetic. I complimented upperclassmen on their increased participation.) He takes this to mean that all twelve hundred students at Juniata are apathetic. I ask humbly that my readers give me credit for enough intelligence to believe I would never have made such an insane assertion. Obviously, I don't believe everyone at Juniata is apathetic, or I wouldn't have bothered writing the editorial.

However, back to Mr. Martuzas argument on why I was in error. His first cites as evidence the fact that there are 150 non-apathetic students at the radio station. I would be perfectly willing to accept this at face value, except for the fact that he follows this up by saying that there are "40 honest hardworking students". The only possible inference here is that only 40 out of 150 students were really serious when they joined the staff. Personally, I see little difference between the student who joins and does nothing, and the one who doesn't join at all.

He concludes this article by saying again that he does not believe in 1200 apathetic Juniata students. (I wish he had taken more time to read the editorial, I wouldn't have been able to argue back on such stupid points). Then he expresses his hope for 200 reliable people. (His numbers keep getting bigger as the article goes on). The point is, however, that earlier he inferred I was giving up on Juniata students while he wasn't. Now he says if he can't find fifty of these mystical 200 students, he will give up everything. It might be beneficial to all of us who tried to find the point of this article, if he could at least have been consistent.

Moving on now, I would like to comment on Mr. Martuzas letter in which argues that the radio station should broadcast away sports events because of immediacy. There are several basic flaws in what he says.

He is obviously right when he says radio can provide more immediacy than the written media. This has been part of the inevitable comparisons since radio became a major means of communication. (By the way, the outcome is always that while radio can provide immediacy, written media can provide far more complete detail). However, he leaves the path, when he states that it is necessary to broadcast away games to have immediacy. He had just made the point that a quick wrap-up right after the game and broadcasting the score repeatedly for a 24 hour period provided this. Obviously, this has nothing to do with broadcasting away games, especially when WHUN is already doing it.

His second flaw is that he states the radio station is not allowed to broadcast these away games. This is simply a misstatement of the facts. I'm not sure who he believes is setting down these restrictions, but I can assure every student that it is not coming from anyone, except possibly the station managers themselves. The example he gives is obviously a special case, but I personally would expect the station to cover that type of game if no public station was. In fact, if that situation occured, I feel reasonably certain that the station might get special funding from the Student Government for that purpose.

Finally, Mr. Martuzas states again that Juniata students are not apathetic, they bjust don't like to write," and that's why the Juniatian is having trouble building a staff. Perhaps, this is true, but that still doesn't explain why they aren't joining some kind of activity where they don't have to write.

Finally, I would like to comment on Mr. Phil Kimmel's letter concerning my statements on Mr. Nixon (Personally, I still hesitate to call him the President). First, he criticizes me for attacking the man. The answer to that is simple. It is virtually impossible to separate presidential policy from the man himself. If Mr. Kimmel can do this, I congratulate him on being extremely talented, and I ask that he consider writing a regular column on politics for us. Secondly, he compares my statements on Mr. Nixon to the Student Evaluation of Professor Blaisdel. This comparison simply is not relevant. The

To the Editor,

Although I'm just a little freshman who doesn't know much of anything. I would like to say that Tom Kurtz is wrong.

Having a deep love for our country, I should think everybody does, I would like to see this whole mess cleared up without any impeachment. This country of ours has gone through a lot of turmoil in its life.

Don't you think that the country has suffered enough with Watergate? Do you think that impeachment will solve anything? Who could take his place, a 70 or 80 year old man? Wouldn't it be better, morale wise, to solve our dilema and keep a president than to leave it open without a president? Think, damn it! You're playing around with not one man but millions of people, a country. A country that you are "proud" of.

If you impeach President Nixon, this country will be humiliated beyond it's present state. So let's solve our problem and keep our president. He hasn't legally done anything wrong anyway.

Greg Schmidt

To the Editor,

As a Juniata College student, I had no idea of the letter writing which took place by our illustrious Student Government. The Student Government impeachment idea has brought to a boil the question of who is representing whom. When the officers were elected, it was the idea that they would keep the student body unified and in contact with current issues, and to all around represent the student body. But, with a question as important as impeachment, I feel they have overstepped their bounds. When the decision was made to commit Juniata College to the impeachment proceedings, the least which could have – should have – been done, was to poll the students in the lunch or dinner lines as to their feelings, and, proceed from there. Just because the Student Government vote was unanimously in favor (save three abstentions), does not mean that they are enough qualified to take a stand on our behalf, knowing what a controversial issue this is. As for feedback from students before the fact-not after-, that shows how well informed the campus is by our Student Government. I, and many others, didn't hear about the action until it was written up in the Ocober 24th JUNIATIAN. THIS BLUNDER MAY END UP FOR IMPEACHMENT PROCEEDINGS FOR TWO, WHERE ONLY ONE HAD BEEN CALLED FOR! ! ! !

Lee Papadeas

To the Editor,

I am sad to report that the past issue of the Juniatian (Oct.24) has at once made me question the purpose of the printed media on this campus and the state of the campus itself. At the risk of sounding moralistic, I feel that the perpetuation of personal fueds and the overemphasis on "one man's" opinion leads to egocentrism, which is defeating the purpose of the news media – to represent fairly and without bias matters of local and National concern. When editorial content approaches 50% of the bulk of a 'newspaper", I would question it's effectiveness in raising conscience and awareness to any degree.

More, I feel that the content of these editorials and articles reflect the lack of contact and carry-over this campus experiences with the rest of the nation. Rather than examining issues with a mind to make these matters more clear, the tendency seems to edge towards "soapboxism" and an active concern with events only as they relate to our secure existence here at Juniata College. If the pressing issues on campus are the state of the radio station, lights for the tennis courts and the status and statisics of our various athletic activities, then we are all in sad shape as far as our awareness is concerned.

If, however, there are other issues more important to our well-being as individuals, (and I feel there are), then the Juniatian is seriously lacking an element essential to all vital and useful media – a contact with something greater than a merely subjective reality.

Respectfully,
Peter Pappalardo

Nothing is more depressing to me than the parent who makes a ritual of collecting little memorabilia of his child's existence and accomplishments. This seeems to me to sink siphoning denticles into the life-throat of the hopeless little one and drains all initiative to be one's own man. To live in pictures, trophies, or on record is to idolize the past and takes the unhealthy aspects of religious deification. Sometimes it's hard to live up to or live down. Our children don't belong to us but to themselves. Their accomplishments belong to them not to us. Or so it is my conceit.

Anyway, a firm believer in signs, I had a sinking feeling in my heart when a few moments after I had sat down Friday night in Oller Hall to watch "The Pirates of Penzance" a gentleman in back of me looking for all the world like a parent, began to fiddle with a tape recorder with which he intended to record the evening's performance. Not wanting this harassment to interfer with the evening's enjoyment (I'm easily distracted being of childlike mind with limited concentration), I got up and moved myself to another seat. This was a mistake, I should have just left and gone home and watched "Beneath the Planet of the Apes" on television.

Next, I discovered the program did not start at 8 o'clock like every other program at Oller Hall but for some unfathomable reason had been changed to 8:15. Having been forwarned that Saturday night was 'sold' out and reserved for parents and it being Gilbert and Sullivan, well, naturally one came in time to get a seat. It was another sign.

So, the evening began. Mr. Hirsch entered with two young ladies who, I guess, according to the program notes, were Miss Deborah Smith and Miss Gail Morgan. The young ladies sat down at the pianos and started what I assume is called 'playing the piano'. Let us rather say, they played 'at' the piano. Perhaps a kindness would be to suggest that the musical instruments needed tuning, badly.

The curtain rose and any hopes I had of salvaging the evening vanished. It seemed as if a road company of the National Lampoon had gathered on stage to bury once and for all the 'Gilbert and Sullivan' myth. A marvelous girl by

VOL. XLVII NO. 5 — OCTOBER 31, 1973

by Dave Andrews

For the first time in my four years at Juniata, I was part of an excited, involved student body at a football game this past Saturday afternoon. Students were cheering on nearly every play, which is quite a change from the days when I was a freshman. The most exciting thing we did then was watch the scoreboard clock change at the end of a quarter.

Our football team is in the midst of a very successful season despite the loss to Wilkes last weekend. Amazingly, this success has been accomplished without an overemphasis on the football program by the coaching staff of Walt Nadzak, Dean Rossi, Richard Reilly, Jim Gardner, and Steve Jackson.

Unlike other schools which accommodate the institution to athletics, the athletic program is conducted here to help fulfill the goals of the institution. There are no private tutors for the athletes here, nor is there a separate meal for the athletes each night. Juniata's football team has achieved success without special privileges.

After talking to team members Al Zubritzky, Jim Rossi, and Keith Colonna; they further substantiated this fact. They said that the coaches told them "academics" come first. When a player has a conflict with a laboratory during practice time, he goes to the laboratory. The coaches keep team meetings as short as possible during the academic term so that the players may have the proper amount of studying time.

Furthermore, the athletic department does not give any scholarships. The football players that receive financial aid do so because of a "need" financial situation, not because of superior athletic ability. Approximately half of the freshman players are not receiving any type of aid.

Moreover, the admissions program should benefit from the team's recent success. The newspapers across the east coast are carrying stories of "Juniata" games. The name of "Juniata" is being known to prospective freshmen via the football program.

Consequently, the football program is proving itself to be a positive part of this institution. The staff and the team are to be commended for their fine efforts this year towards the welfare of Juniata College.

P.S.— While I'm in the spirit of commendation, special recognition must be given to Bruce Hirsch and the cast of "Pirates of Penzance" for their excellent performance over Parent's Weekend.

JACK ANDERSON

by J. G. McDonald,
Editor of Kvasir

Every morning at 6:30 Jack Anderson rises to shower, shave, and brush his teeth. Breakfast (a meal he frequently skips) is served at the institution's cafeteria and he proceeds to the Control Center where, at 7:15 a.m., he changes into his school clothes. An institutional official drives him and his friend Rich Armstrong to Ellis Hall. Jack checks his mail, raps with some fellow students, and then heads for the library to study for an hour or so before classes begin. Two classes take up the rest of the morning and he goes to lunch at the J.C. cafteria. Two days a week Writing Program classes take at least an hour. The rest of the afternoon is spent studying, working out at the gym, or discussions over coffee at Ellis. At 4:30 p.m. an institutional official arrives at Ellis Hall to drive Jack and Rich back. At the Control Center a careful shakedown takes place and after changing clothes, Jack goes to dinner. At 5:45 p.m. he returns haps watch some T.V. At 9:00 p.m. he is locked in his cell for the night. Here Jack will study and write until midnight or later.

Jack, age 29, a student at J.C. and a aspiring young writer, is doing six to twelve years at the Huntingdon Correctional Institution for "drug related crimes". Obviously a unique student, Jack is also an unusual prisoner as his record during confinement shows.

During his incarceration since June 1970, Jack helped to organize a drug rehabilitation group, Human Efforts Against Drugs (H.E.A.D.). As an officer and representative of this group he has appeared on T.V. panel discussion shows. He is currently Chairman of the Board and Advisor to the Membership of the Altar Rock Jaycees, an in prison chapter of that organization. As past president and executive vice president Jack has a distinguished record of service with the Jaycees. Before piloting the inmate on campus project at J.C. (with Rich Armstrong) Jack took three Psychology courses at the prison. Jack, who has "exceptional" status at the Huntingdon Institution, is presently waiting for word from the Board of Pardons on his petition for commutation of his sentence. Failing that, he expects to be released to the Community Treatment Program by Thanksgiving of this year.

On campus Jack recently became the J.C. Student Government Representative on the Board of Trustees. After almost two terms on campus he insists that the professors are personally helpful and that he likes the freedom of the new curriculum. The students, he says, are interested in his unique situation and are always ready to provide friendly assistance. His one big problem is adjusting to the radical daily change of environment—from prisoner to student to prisoner.

Jack started writing two years ago with no particular direction. Then in a Introdutory Psychology course with Prof. Lakatos things started to take shape. He said that Prof. Lakatos through his close relationships with the students", "Stimulated a greeat interest in learning." He stated that his interest in writing was furthered with the help of Nancy Davis, then an Instructor in the Writing Program at J.C. Although his major area of emphasis is Psychology. Jack said that writing is becoming more important to him due to "the help of, and interaction with, other student writers and the Writing Program instructors."

Jack's as yet unpublished book, Night Cries — A Collection of Prison Moods is ample evidence of his increasing ability as writer and poet. His feelings about his own words. The following is quoted from the preface to Night Cries.

"A writer's works most probably rhyme with his own perception of the subject. If the writer's perception is that of innocence, is clear and untainted, then most likely his words will sing sweetly. But, if the reflections of the writer's soul which manifest themselves in his works carry connotations of cynicism, satire, bitterness, or just plain ugliness then these may in fact be construed as the rhymes which match with his living experience. It is my belief that a little bit of realistic harshness can offer valuable insight to any who are willing to open their minds slightly wider than before just long enough to allow the relating process to adhere to them."

KVASIR and the JUNIATIAN are proud to inaugerate this column with the work of a fellow student who is both an asset to our community and an inspiration to all of us. The poems reprinted below are from NIGHT CRIES — A Collection of Prison Moods, copyright 1973 by Jack L. Anderson.

NORMAL DAYS

Trolleys and busses rambling over unpaved streets, as multicolored neon flashes signal time and temperature.

Boat whistles echoing in darkness, while lovers of the same sex caress intimately, and cars smash each other to make the ambulance scream.

Men gather to watch rockets go up, while switchblades shine— and children fall,
your son went to die in a war— somewhere, and the preacher told you of the joy of living.

Picasso grows older but continues his art, while skiers— ski, and skaters— skate, as the eskimo chased the pygmy home and told the yogi to get off his head.

A Treasure of thought

Four leaves of the clover given in moments of spontaneous affection, deserve to be cherished over and over,
by treasures of thought, and genuine appreciation. . .

MY FRIEND

My friend,
I wish that for lingering moments—
I may become you.
And you in your turn—
may experience I.
And we shall gaze into the eyes of the other—only to see our oneness.

A MEMORY

I remember a girl I once knew,
both once upon a time and long ago.
The place was Chicago, where we walked in rain and snow.

We held each other's hand, and even sang a song together.
The sky was mad, and told us so by a magnificent display of horrible weather.

We were attacked by a full force of the well known wind of the city.
But we laughed at the elements, and never thought to cry for pity.

We simply ignored life, because we were truly living.
and time ceased to be as we shared the joys of giving.

Then I asked her what she did,
and she said she was a whore.
So I left of course,
stepping into forever as I went through the door.

But I remember a girl—
both once upon a time and long ago.

Brother?

My brother the man,
darkness of skin.
Pale blue of eye, the lightest tan—
as he loses in order to win.
Remaining the same—
despite humanity's trials. . .and terrible game.

Sports Stumpin'

Wake up Juniata! It was nice while it lasted but now it's time to come back to earth and see what we can make of the rest of the season. The loss to Wilkes was a tough one with the game in doubt up to the final minutes. How would the defeat effect the team from here on in? Well to find out I went to my good buddy Big Al Zubritzky. You all know Big Al or at least have seen him around. For those of you who are not to familiar with Al he is a 6 ft. 200 pound junior guard who has been a starter ever since he came to Juniata. He comes from Montour High in Western Pa., the heart of tough high school football.

Well, after talking to Big Al I found that the loss to Wilkes will have many effects on the team. For one it's going to make practice Hell this week. But more so, it will relieve a lot of the pressure that has been mounting on the team. The team is still pretty young but one big difference Al has seen in the team is that this year everyone is working together picking each other up where in past years if someone made a mistake the team would be down on him. This year if one guy goofs someone else is there or at least they have the confidence so as to make things right. No friction between the line and the backs and more important no friction within the line. The line has learned to work together and this has helped make the offense go.

The publicity didn't really help the team as No. 1 in the East and all the talk of an undefeated season was nice but Al would rather have the publicity wait till the season is over. Publicity is not something Al, as a lineman, is accustom to. But he is used to it by now and gets his own personal rewards as the experts give credit where credit is due as Al was named on the ECAC team honorable mention for his work against Lycoming.

So the bubble has been burst but we still have a chance for the MAC title, but now we face what could be our toughest test when we play the Titans of Westminister, who have a perfect 7-0 record. Al feels that the team really didn't show what they could do but this week will be a different story. With the pressure off, JC should be able to go out and play the way everyone knows they can. Also there are some added attractions in the Westminister game in that JC is seeking revenge for the defeat the Titans handed them last year. Also there is the incentive, at least for Al, that he will be playing against many of the players he played against in high school and would like to show them and everyone else that the Indians are among the class teams of the Division 3 Eastern section.

In The Apartment, seen earlier this term, director Billy Wilder turned his comic insight into the world of big business. With The Lost Weekend, released about 15 years earlier, Wilder chose a much more serious topic, delving into the psyche of an alcoholic.

Ray Milland puts in a stunning, Oscar-winning performance as the alcoholic who is trying to "kick the habit". His performance is excellent in its portrayal of the struggle and failure for the suppression of temptation, like Ernest Borgnine with Marty. With this role, Ray Milland showed a great potential for acting which has not been realized since. He has degenerated to playing in such cheap horror flicks as Frogs and X-The Man With the X-ray Eyes. In this role, though, he is perfect.

Wilder's direction is as good in this earlier film as in The Apartment. Of particular excellence are the delirium tremors sequences, where rats and other miscellaneous vermin descend on Milland enmasse. Scenes like these are definitely not recommended for those with queasy stomachs.

I must apologize for the vagueness of this review, but, once again, I have not seen the film, so I can only report on what I have read about it. It will be shown Tuesday, November 6 at 8 P.M. in Alumni Hall. Oh, by the way, I heartily recommend that you come to this film sober, otherwise, you may crawl out.

Inspired Wilkes Checks JC

by Tony Martuzas

Last Saturday, on a cool and sunny day, Wilkes College behind Juniata in the running for the MAC Championship (and far behind in the ballotting for the Lambert Bowl) clashed with the unbeaten Indians, on their own terrain. Wilkes came out on top 25-15, by virtue of many factors. For one, they had to win: one more defeat would knock them out of the race. There were costly mistakes by both teams, but it was Wilkes which capitalized on its breaks and a fluke touch down.

A play occured in the second quarter which set the stage for the upset. Colonel quarterback Chuck Suppon was sprinting out to his left and looked down the left sidelines for his halfback leaving the backfield. His back was covered tightly by Juniata defender Steve Lehman. Suppon cocked his arm, checked once and right before he was buried and spotted his fullback Bill Horan sneaking underneath the Defensive Secondaries umbrella. The ball sailed in Horan's direction and he grasped it and snuggly nestled on the ground before and defender could flatten him. This big play (after having their backs against the wall) and also still smarting from a recent Juniata score, turned the game around, as Wilkes halfback Fred Lehman dived into the endzone nine plays later.

The Indians at the half were leading by a mere point. By the middle of the third quarter the lead vanished and suddenly they were trailing by five points. In the third quarter (later) still trailing 12-7, the Juniata Offense was pinned down deep in their own territory. Wilkes gambled with a blitz, but halfback Lou Eckerl ripped through the line and galloped downfield before he was lasooed at the Wilkes forty yard line. The Juniata Bench erupted and the cheer, "WE GOT 'EM"! "WE GOT 'EM"! rang out, the listless home crowd stirred and were brought back to life due to Eckerl's brilliant run. After a couple futile rushing attempts by Lou and quarterback Gary Shope, on the option, pitched to Greg Kennedy who twisted through the fragmented Colonel defensive lime. Greg's run electrified the crowd and from nine yards out Lou Eckerl again got the call and slashed through the line composed of Oak, Ryan, Zubritsky, Zorger and Lentini (TE). Not satisfied with a thin one-point lead, Shope flipped the ball to Carm Defrancesco and he plunged into the endzone for another two points. Score: Juniata 15, Wilkes 12.

As th fourth quarter opened, the Wilkes Colonels took over at their own 25 yard line and had a mean Indian Defense to contend with. With first and long, quarterback Chuck Suppon had the unfortunate pleasure of meeting freshmen Don Page and Stu Jackson, and Mr. Suppon was promptly swallowed up. A run didn't work out as the interior line of Stu Jackson (DT), Jim (Bear) Rescigno, and Don Page (DT) devoured the unfortunate Wilkes runner. With Chuck Suppon again scrambling for dear life, he miraculously (again) spotted his fullback (Horan) open at midfield. Suppon fired and connected with his back for a big first down. On a crucial fourth and short yardage, halfback Rod Smith got the first down and don't ask me how. A few plays later, quarterback Suppon jumped up and connected with his end, Soph. George Abraham over the middle for the go ahead touchdown. The onsuing snap from center was mishandled and a desperation pass floated hopelessly over the intended receiver's head. Only a Juniata field goal could tie the game, a touchdown could win it. The scoreboard flashed 18-15, in favor of Wilkes.

After the Juniata kick-off seturn, Eckerl was again assigned the task of bulldozing through the line. After a good gain by Shope, Gary rifled a pass but failed to connect with his slick receiver Rick Rudolph at the twenty yard line. Since that was a fourth down play, Wilkes took over.

Greg Kennedy and Carm Defrancesco were put to work, charging through the line. Mike McNeal cutting down the sideline, tried to pull in a Shope pass but Wilkes defender Terry Blaum batted it down. A pitchout to Carm resulted in another Indian first down. Lou Eckerl, bulldozing again got another first down. Then the ball squirted loose.

No sooner than Wilkes took over and after Mark (Hampster) Smallwood's brilliant defensive play, quarterback Suppon pitched to his fullback Bill Horan who had the ball separated from him. The ball flipped in the air and fell neatly into the waiting hands of George Abraham and he scurried to the goal line for the final score.

So, the game ended. A chorus of "taps" rang out from the rowdy Wilkes stands and the Juniata fans solemnly began emptying their seats with still a couple minutes remaining in the game. After the clock ticked out its last seconds, buses carrying the jubilant Wilkes College partisans paraded in front of Ellis Hall exclaiming, "WE'RE NUMBER ONE!" Their cheers may be premature.

This is the best team Juniata has had in a long time. I wonder why people only support winners. The Indians just had a crucial game, and a little more enthuasiam could have helped. Look at Wilkes and their boosters.

And sometimes with a little too much inconsideratness for my taste. But then she was stealing the show.

The only other person on the stage with any stage presence was the delightful Cricket Smith. She is as natural on stage as stars are in the heavens. Being dressed in blue which stood out gloriously from the others, I had hopes at the very beginning that she had been cast in a lead role. No such good fortune.

As for the singing by the rest of the taggle-cast, it was just plain miserable no matter how low your standards. No where did I see the splendid touches that usually mark the productions of Bruce and Marjorie Hirsch. Perhaps this was their Halloween joke on us.

I walked out at intermission. I didn't want to throw up in case there might be the accustomed standing ovation. This time it would have been too galling.

An editorial, on the other hand, is openly a statement of opinion. Obviously, to make it mean anything, the opinion must be backed up with fact. I believe I can back up my opinions with fact. If Mr. Kimmel is interested in challenging my facts, I would be glad to accept the debate. It would certainly be educational for both of us.

Elderly, Alone— Students Help

by Dave Mitchell

The Student Volunteer Service at Juniata College is a very important part of many local residents' lives. It is of a special importance to many of the area's elderly residents who live alone and have a little chance to socialize, or have much outside communication with tthe area's townspeople due to lack of transportation, sickness, or just plain old age. SVS is helping to take care of this problem.

There are a number of students in SVS who are just involved in helping and socializing with the aged. They work in several different groups and several different ways. The geriatrics ward of J. C. Blair Memorial Hospital is the homegrounds for the workings of one group. Students from SVS visit the ward Mondays through Fridays from the hours of twelve thirty to three o'clock. Working on small projects to keep idle hands busy is basically what's been going on, but this time of day is very important to the elderly folks. It has become a time when they can socialize with others and find out what's going on in the lives of young people and get a fresh outlook on current issues. The older people involved here are members of the Huntingdon County Nursing Home, which is a part of the J. C. Blair Hospital.

There are many elderly people in the Huntingdon area who live by themselves and cannot take part in the hospital program. SVS has another answer for them. Although it's still in its formation stages this year, SVS has a program for the visitation of shut-ins which proved to be very effective last year. In this program students and the people they plan to visit plan their own schedule of visitation around the student's hours and the visited person's hours. They can arrange as to how frequently the visits are to be and their length. During visits, students and their elderly host just talk about current items of interest and topics of the past and just about any subject under the sun. Students often times read to them or play games but no matter what they do, it becomes a great way to know a person, and a great way for a person to know you. If you wish to become involved, contact Faith Shoemaker at 316 Lesher or at Box 1193 or get in touch with Glen Mitchell, 305 Cloister of Box 1103.

People experiencing people. Why don't you get involved? After all, that's what life's all about.

Students Take Time To Help Others

by Rob Lopresti

The Student Volunteer Service was founded last year on the wild hunch that there are kids at Juniata who aren't apathetic and could be interested in helping people. One glance at its growing list of activities is proof that hunches sometimes pay off.

S.V.S. is a branch of the Student Government, a group of programs through which Juniata students can aid the people of Huntingdon and the surrounding communities. The programs range from Day Care to Shut-in Visitation.

According to Glenn Mitchell, one of the Service's coordinators, the SVS has several purposes. It provides needed volunteer action, improves the relationship between college and community, and gives the student a chance to get involved in something besides academics.

There are about 80 to 90 students involved; more than last year. "We're very pleased with the number of kids we've had" said Glenn. In some programs such as Big Brothers, there are more volunteers than there are people to help.

However, other services still have plenty of openings. The tutoring program and 4-H need workers. And volunteers are needed to visit shut-ins and the home for the elderly.

One reason SVS is looking for new faces is that they have new programs. The tutoring and probation services are both new; still in the process of organization.

The other good news is that they have a car. A JC alumni, Klaire Sunderland donated a new car through Key Buick Garage.

Anyone who would like to volunteer, or knows of some need in the community that volunteers might help fill, are urged to contact Glenn Mitchell, Box 1103, or Kim Hershberger, Box 1055.

And finally SVS says thanks for all the help. Help is what SVS is all about.

Ever feel stagnated within the world of 17th St. to the south and Taylor Highlands to the north? Ever consider perhaps venturing south of 17th St. to the world existing beyond? There is an organization on the Juniata campus which does such a daring thing and that is SVS (Student Volunteer Service.) SVS offers many areas of student involvement in the Huntingdon area. One of the most popular this term is the Day Care Center, which presently has 19 student volunteers.

The Day Care Center, located in the old Huntingdon High School building, corner of 10th and Moore, has a wide range of child care services. Perhaps they could more accurately be called a comprehensive child development center. Five areas of development are stressed— physical, maturational, psychological, social, and cognitive— and each in a setting of mutual interaction.

SVS volunteers at the Center have the same rights and obligations as the other staff members. Volunteers give a limited amount of time (usually no more than two or three hours a week) with the commitment that he or she will always be there at that time. If something comes up, the center should be notified. Continuity of service is stressed because it is important for the child to have a measure of stability in his life. Male volunteers are especially in demand each term. They provide a kind of "father figure" which is so often lacking in the children's home environment.

SVS is also involved in providing drivers for transporting children to and from the Center. This is an important responsibility; the Center has no vehicle or drivers of its own and so must rely on student volunteers.

Day Care has three different classes during the course of the school year—a nursery school for 4-yr. olds and two regular classes based on chronological age and social maturity. The nursery school meets only in the afternoons and is more structured than the other two. Here the emphasis is on the acquiring of early life skills. The two other classes consist of a younger and an older group. The younger group has mostly three and some four-year olds and stresses socialization and language development. The child learns by doing and everything has a purpose. The older group, consisting of four and five-year olds, is more cognitively oriented. The purpose is to try to make the transition to elementary school a smooth one.

There is also a summer recrea-

Students Work With Child Welfare And Probation As Aids To Case Workers

The child welfare program and the probation program are now in the beginning stages. These two programs are designed to aid children in the Huntingdon area who have specific problems with their environment.

The child welfare program works mainly with foster children. Students work as supplements to case workers; babysitting, acting as a Big Brother to children of foster homes, and in many other capacities. At the present time, there are ten students working with the families of these children, and three others driving for the agency. These drivers take children to the doctor, drive mother to shop, and take the families to many other places that they need to go.

Most of the children the students work with, come from bad home environments. The students work in socializing the children and getting to know the families. Their job is to work on a personal basis with the families out of the context of the child welfare office.

The Probation Program works with predelinquent children from the ages of 14 to 18. These children are not necessarily ones who have been in trouble with the law, but may have been referred to the probation office by the school. The Students work on a one to one basis with the child. The attitude is not to help save the child, but to give him some new experiences and a helping hand in life.

In this program the child is only told that a student will be calling on them. All meeting occur outside of the probation office, and this is to give the child a chance to be freer in talking with the student. Students will be spending about 2 to 3 hours per week with the children taking them places and just being friends.

For the Child Welfare program, there are thirteen students in all working with the office. Sixteen JC students have been interviewed for the Probation Program, and the office is now in the process of matching children with students. This program will begin sometime after Thanksgiving.

Huntingdon Children Receive Instruction In Various Fields

by Tim Reiner

The Student Volunteer Services sponsors a 4-H Club at the Crawford Apartments in Huntingdon. 4-H is a nation-wide service organization which educates children of elementary school to high school age in the better use of the heads, hearts, hands, and health. The programs offered by the national group range from farming to homemaking crafts.

Here in Huntingdon, the programs currently offered are cooking/sewing and electricity. For both classes there are no age and/or sex restrictions. The cooking class has sixteen chefs, ranging in age from 5-14, including two boys. Dreidra Kensinger, Kathy Stuck, and Beth Moreland instruct these sixteen boys and girls every Wednesday evening at the Crawford Apartments. The second half of this program will be spent teaching sewing skills. Glenn Mitchell has six boys in his electricity program. Glenn teaches simple projects that the boys enjoy very much. Both programs are successful on the small scale.

The Student Volunteer Services 4-H programs could use some more help from JC students, guys are especially needed; both for cooking /sewing and electricity classes and to iniate new programs. Anyone with an interest in helping children and a talent in carpentary, drying flowers, gymnastics, handicrafts or any other projects, please contact Glenn Mitchell at 643-9987.

Letters to the Editor

Letters to the editor should be addressed to: Editor, The Juniatian, Box 667, Juniata College, Huntingdon, Pa. 16652. The editors reserve the right to print only non-libelous and responsible content and to edit all letters and commentaries submitted to The Juniatan. The staff also reserves the right to publish all full signatures unless the writer can supply valid reason for omitting his name.

Editor's Note — We had many responses to Edward Kinchley Evan's article concerning the Pirates of Penzance. I personally felt that the review was unfair and did not take into account the many hours that went into the production. There were many letters, but they were basically repetitive and I felt that it would be best and most interesting to print the one that said what was the majority of students' minds.

I also would like to say that we receive many letters to the editor, and appreciate all of them. But, due to a space problem, we are not able to print all of them. Please keep writing, we appreciate it.

Pirates of Penzance

To the Editor:

We all recognize the problem described in the colloquial phrase "putting one's foot in one's mouth". A perfect example of such an occurance appeared in the October 31 issue of The Juniatian in the form of Edward Kinchley Evans. Mr. Evans, for as long as I have been following his articles, has been a generally knowledgeable critic, offering tasteful and rather polished criticism. In his review of "The Pirates of Penzance" however, it happened. Old Edward placed the proverbial foot firmly between his lips and bit down. His references to the "play acting" on the parts of several major characters, and of the chorus, display a basic misunderstanding of Gilbert and Sullivan. Mr. Evan's failure to recognize the blatent tongue-in-cheek attitude of the cast points up a rather discomforting insensitivity on his part.

In his critique of "The Pirates of Penzance", Mr. Evans did not point out any particular failings in the efforts of either the cast or Bruce and Majorie Hirsch, but instead made public his ignorance of Gilbert and Sullivan.

Keep writing, Edward, but please try to approach your subject matter with some basis for judgment.

Slave Auction

To the Editor:

I am writing to suggest that the institution of the Slave Auction is one that Juniata could well do without. Perhaps it is a deficiency on my part, but I do not find slave auctions a fun thing. I suppose that the money raised from the Auction goes to some worthwhile cause, but there must be some less obnoxious way to raise it. We could, for example, run a charity program or charge admission to mock gladiatorial combats. If greater student participation is called for, a heretic hunt might work, where everybody pays his money and then gets to beat up on the denomination of his choice with an air bladder.

I realize that by making this suggestion I run the risk of being considered another old fart faculty member out to stifle good natured student jollity, but I believe more is at stake here than youthful high jinks. While arch storming and panty raiding are not my idea of a swell way to kill an evening, I would not quarrel with a student's right to act like Jack Oakie or Dick Powell in a 30's college movie. Slave auctions, on the other hand, are demeaning of human value. It does not matter, finally, if they are all in fun, or for a good cause. As Vonnegut says, "We are what we pretend to be." The mere fact that there can be a slave auction, all in fun, bespeaks a certain moral callousness. Surely, the idea of an all-campus Concentration Camp Day, for a good cause, would be generally greeted with repugnance. The Slave Auction is not different in kind from this, but only in immediacy. Does horror become good clean fun if its more than a generation old?

Sincerely,
Mark R. Hochberg

I came across two quotes this past week during my literary meanderings in this "Erebus" of Time in which I find myself. The first was in a review in the theatrical weekly "Variety" and concerned the film version of an Edward Albee play "The Delicate Balance". . . .

Albee's plays, despite the awards they have won, lack much in appeal, mainly because of the hidden meanings in his writings. "Delicate Balance" probes the relationsips of a small group in a tense confining situation in a 36-hour period in an upper-middle class household in Connecticut.". . . .

The other quote . . . "And judgment is turned away backward, and justice standeth afar off: for truth is fallen in the street, and equity cannot enter." . . . . and that came from an old cat called Isaiah who really made the Big Time by saying these "off the wall" kind of things and so got included in the Who's Who along the prophet line.

So much for deliberate quotes.

On Thursday morning in Oller Hall, I went to see a performance of Edward Albee's "The American Dream". It is a one act play and to show you how far truth has fallen in our streets, it is referred to as being absurd drama.

It is the American dream factory that manufactures our concept of ourselves and you wake us up from this illusion with a sharp punch in our guts and we don't like it or you. So we dismiss the brutality of your observation by dragging an asbestos curtain over our eyes and mouthing the comforting pulp . . . 'that's absurd . . . don't know what it means . . . nothing to do with my life, mine, or me . . . give me back my old reality . . . my titty suck . . . I don't want to know what a mess I've made of my personal world.. I just want to be entertained with something to make me forget... forget...and...to sleep."

"The American Dream" was an excellent performance by amateaurs who gave us "the audience" the courtesy of acting professionally. They were more concerned with performing the play as it was written to be performed than in "being in" a play. I'm always a little unhappy when actors on stage seem to be having a better time of it than I am in the audience.

Theatre is a serious business and it little matters whether you are performing comedy, farce, or drama. Your obligation to the playwright and the audience is your first obligation. When this is neglected you reduce your contribution to a self-indulgence of infantile behavior that brightens the eye and warms the heart and sells diapers.

Mrs. Goehring seems a barmy skylark in this academic birdcage but watch out...she has the sobriety of an Eagle when it comes to theatre. Her choice of plays take courage. Her actors have a seriousness of purpose that indicates that their first solo flight better work cause Mama Eagle ain't gonna be too happy with the return to the aerie otherwise.

God bless Doris Goehring and keep her well.

Are you working on a worthwhile project that you are excited about and you want others to know? Do you feel that there is not enough publicity given to the little, but important events on campus? We on the Juniation staff would like to print any news, stories or general happenings about anything on campus but often don't know where to look. If you have any ideas for stories at any time, please contact us at Box 667 or see Alice Boomhower (Box 27).

Comedy is Theme For Winter Term Movies

by Brad Rudy

"If you will laugh yourself into stitches, follow me." Thus wrote Shakespeare in his classic comedy, "Twelfth Night." The Fine Arts committee holds the same sentiment. If you want to lighten your winter months by "laughing yourself into stitches," follow us to the second term film series—"The Art of the Great Comedians".

Kicking off the series, on December 4, will be an evening of five short silent classics, mostly under the direction of Mack Sennett: Two Keystone Kops comedies, one with Edgar Gergen ("All American Draw back",) one with Harold Lloyd ("Haunted Spooks"), and one with Harry Angdon ("Smile Please").

After that, on December 7, we have the immortal tramp, Charlie Chaplin. "The Tramp," the short that created the famous character and chaplinesque combination of humor and pathos, will be shown along with "Tillie's Punctured Romance", Chaplin's first full-length comedy, and excerpts from the "Gold Rush," including the classic sequence where a starving Chaplin boils and eats his boots.

Next, on December 11, will be two by Buster Keaton, perhaps the most avant-garde of the silent comedians: "The Balloonatic," a short showing Keaton's hilarious battles with nature, and "The General", his classic film depicting a man's love for his train. After Christmas, on January 8, Laurel and Hardy will be shown with "Blockheads" and "Leave 'em Laughin." On January 11 will be the immortal Marx Bros. with "Cocoanuts" and "Monkey Business." Completing the classic comedians will be W. C. Fields on January 22 with "The Fatal Glass of Beer" and "Never Give a Sucker an Even Break."

Two modern comedians will move in on January 29 and February 9. The first of these will be Zero Mostel in "A Funny Thing Happened on the Way to the Forum." It is a hilarious parody on musical comedies and ancient Rome in which a slave (Mostel) does every thing he can to win his freedom. (Buster Keaton makes a cameo appearance as Mostel's father who must continually run aroud the seven hills of Rome). The 2nd of the modern comedians is Woody Allen in his 1972 hit "Play it Again Sam," in which he is urged in his amorous pursuits by the ghost of Humphrey Bogart. Rounding out the series, on February 12, will be the classic W. C. Fields — Mae West comedy, "My Little Chickadee."

Once again, there will be several extra films, shown in Oller Hall with a slightly higher admission fee. Right after Thanksgiving vacation (Nov. 30) will be Mike

"Joker" marks Steve Miller's first new release in nearly two years. Many Steve Miller Band addicts probably thought the end had come with the appearance of the "Anthology" album, but continued live performances indicated further longevity.

For anyone who has waited the year and a half for this new album (and I don't think there have been too many), puzzlement may be the reaction, for Steve Miller's herd has once again changed. "Joker" finds Steve belching out those old, familiar blues-rock melodies that graced his first three albums. Thus, this album seems more the successor of 1969's "Brave New World" than the rather mystical "Journey From Eden," released in early 1972.

Miller of course, has found it difficult, if not impossible, to keep a permanent group. His first two albums represent his finest comglomeration: including Boz Scaggs, Jim Peterman, Tim Davis, and with the gradual loss of these star personel, successive Miller Band albums have been terribly mediocre. "Number 5" and "Rock Love" were just plain bad, while "Journey From Eden" showed some new direction.

So new we have "The Joker"; in many ways, an OK album. It has a difficult time in getting off, though. "Sugar Babe" starts out nicely with what sounds like five or six guitars played in unison, but the song begins to plod along without any essential musical development. "Mary Lou" at first sounds like Jamaician regga it sounds curiously similar to Paul Simon's "Why Don't You Write Me?" But closer examination will reveal that its another low down funky blues number of the kind Miller seems most comfortable in. "Shu Ba Du Ma Ma Ma Ma" hits a resounding 19w — its merely an exhibiton for various Miller Band members. "Your Cash Ain't Nothing But Trash", which closes side one really lifts the listener out of the doldrums, however. Its another up-tempo blues with just bass and drums accompniment plus an array of sound effects. This track is the sole factor needed to compel the listener to turn over the record.

The title song gives Miller a chance to expound on his various roles in the past; everything from the "Space Cowboy" to the "Gangster of Love". To the list, he adds "The Joker, the smoker, the all night toker." "Loving Cup" is a straight blues cut featuring some nice mouth harp work by Steve. The next two cuts, "Come On In My Kitchen" and "Evil" are live. The latter is the more interesting possibly because "....Kitchen" is Steve Miller without his band. (just acoustic guitar). The audience(s) seem incredibly indulgent, applauding and whistling frequently throughout. "Something to Believe In" which ends the album, is a quiet ballad, but nothing special.

What we have here, I think, is Steve Miller trying to redefine and strengthen his stud image. He seems deeper into the blues than at any time in the past. Thus, "Joker" sacrifices some of that inspired material that marked "Children of the Future" and "Sailor". The result is a modest effort — an OK album but significantly lesser than what Steve Miller is capable of producing.

the event that Mr. Kimmel does not respond, I would like to accept that challenge. In the editorial Mr. Siedzekowski stated, "Obviously to make it mean anything, the opinion must be backed up with fact". With this in mind, I refer to his editorial in the October 24, Juniatian.

Mr. Siedzikowski is apparently in agreement with the Student Government's decision to support the ACLU's efforts for impeachment. In an article in the same issue, Alice Boomhower gives Mr. Nixon's refusal to hand over the tapes as the cause of the Student Government's action. Mr. Siedzikowski accuses Mr. Nixon of "kamakazi-like attacks on the American system of Justice," and says that his firing of Mr. Cox is "in direct defiance of the two lower courts which ruled against Nixon." In fact Mr. Nixon was well within his rights when he fired the Special Prosecuter. We can question his motives, but at no time has he "attacked" our system of Justice. Mr. Siedzekowski seems to begin with the national security information and Mr. Nixon could not be interested in protecting the principle of executive privilege and the powers of the executive branch of our government.

Let's look at the other reasons the Student Government gives for supporting impeachment. "1) He has admittedly taken government funds for improvement of his property. This he claims was done for security reasons." True, many, in fact most, of the improvements to Mr. Nixon's San Clemente home appear to be unrelated to security and therefore inappropriate. However if we consider this to be an impeachable offense, then we must reflect that more should have been impeached. 2) There are hints of deals with ITT and dairy companies." Several respected lawyers have said the ITT anti-trust settlement was favorable to the Government—not ITT, and was completely in line with other similar cases. What would the ACLU say if the Government charged a man with murder because his neighbors hinted that he killed his wife? 3) "Nixon's connection with Watergate has been questioned." The evidence, to date, of Mr. Nixon's involvement in the Watergate burglary and coverup consists largely of the testimony of one man, John Dean, who had his own interest at stake in implicating higher officials. I am not saying that Mr. Dean lied, but that we have no more reason to believe his testimony than that of Mitchell, Haldeman, and Erlichman which cleared the President of involvement. 4) "It is possible that secret bombings of Cambodia are unconstitutional." This statement admits the fact that the bombings may have been consitutional.

Of the reasons that the Student Government gives for impeachment then, only one — that he inappropriately used government funds, is valid and reasonably substantiated. I sincerely pray to God that our Student Government did not really mean their last three statements to be justifications of impeachment.

Let me say at this point that I am not attempting to justify Mr. Nixon's actions. Personally I believe that he may have been involved in Watergate and may have to be impeached. All Americans should look towards impeachment with regret. At the very least, we should wait until the facts show definitely that the President has abused his office. The President, like all other citizens, should be considered innocent until proven guilty.

In concluding his editorial, Mr. Siedzikowski makes a call for us to "find the guts to speak out." I repeat this call but let's speak out rationally, with an eye for the facts. I think you would agree, Mr. Siedzikowski, that we have enough rhetoric coming from our politicians.

tion program at the Center which includes a 6-12 yr.-old age group and mentally handicapped children. This program definitely needs volunteers so if you're planning on going to summer school, here's a chance to get involved.

Another program similar to the one at the Day Care Center is the Head Start program at Brady Henderson School, Mill Creek, Pa. SVS presently has two volunteers there. The Head Start program involves 30 underpriviledged children which are divided into two groups — 15 in the morning group and 15 in the afternoon. The child is the important person. Teachers and volunteers try to meet the child on his own level without regard to chronological age.

SVS volunteers at Head Start do about the same job as the other teacher aides. They are encouraged to follow the goals of the program —to accept the child for himself and help him to recognize his importance as an individual member of society. In so doing, the child comes to feel that he, too, has something to offer.

As at the Day Care Center, the child learns by doing. He learns cooperation in his interactions with the other children and gains self-confidence by performing tasks on his own. Language arts, numbers, mental alertness, muscular coordination, and nutrition and personal hygiene are also stressed.

The purpose of all this is to give the low-income child a "boost" before he enters elementary school. He has many times not received the cultural stimulation found in most middle and upper class home environments. Because so much learning takes place at an early age, the culturally deprived child would lag behind his classmates in social and mental development if something were not done to ameliorate this.

Another area of SVS involvement is the Big Brother-Big Sister program funded by the Huntingdon Community Center. This program attempts to establish a one-to-one relationship between a child from a broken, underpriviledged home (generally) and an older person. Hopefully, the relationship would be stable and dependable: something the child needs in his environment. The SVS volunteer works out a schedule of visitation with his or her young friend and is reimbursed by the Community Center for any expenses.

Many JC students have participated in these three programs through SVS and the response has been very favorable. These people certainly deserve credit for performing a valuable service both to the children involved and the community as a whole.

Women's Field Hockey Team Concludes Successful Season

by Vernne Wetzel

The Juniata Women's Field Hockey Team has concluded a very successful first year. The season record was 2-3-1. The team started the season by being beaten by Dickinson. College hockey is a much quicker and more aggressive game than high school level hockey. The girls learned a lot from their first game. In the second game with Susquehanna, the defense played a strong game. The offense developed as strongly and as quickly as the defense. That game was played to a 0-0 tie. The next game was with Indiana. Although the team lost, the offense was able to get together for a score. This game marked a kind of turning point in the season. With each game the players gained confidence and were getting accoustomed to working together as a team.

Juniata's first victory came against undefeated (4-0) Lycoming at their Homecoming. Our team was really prepared for the game, particularly in confidence. We defeated Lycoming by 3-1. The offense put on a strong performance, and the defense joined in the effort to make it the best game of the season.

This game was followed by a disappointing loss to Bucknell. We were able to score, but Bucknell got some officiating breaks and out-scored us. The final game was on Parent's Day against Lycoming. A sizable crowd was on hand to watch JC again defeat Lycoming 2-1.

The hardest team we faced was Dickinson, who had had a team for several years. Lycoming and Susquehanna were both young teams. In just one season Juniata has realized that there is a lot of talent, and a lot of interest in field hockey. The improvement in the team from September to the end of October was phenomenal. Virtually the whole team will be back next year (only one senior is leaving). The athletic department and the coach, Joanne Reilly, did a good job in organizing and carrying out the field hockey program. The all-out effort by the players themselves was what really made it a success, though. Some of the players that led the team this year were Kim Norris (Capt.), LuAnn Steiner, Kyle Messick, Holly Harman, Bev Martin, Pam Weaver, and Jacque Prentiss. The players who showed the great improvement (many had never played before) were Robin Bepler, Diane Dawson, JoAnn Gilford, Lillian Hollyday, Anita Kustanbauter, Delores Lingafelt, Katie Middleton, Marge Morgan, Noreen O'Connell, Marty Prentiss, Jan Snyder, Petra Theodos, Leslie Whittaker, and Sue Wiser. Eleven of these girls are freshmen.

Since my freshman year, JC has gone from practically nothing to a varsity schedule in field hockey. I think it's been a long time coming, and with what I've seen and had a chance to be a part of this year, the best is still coming.

Student Forum

On Thursday, November 8, starting at 7:00 p.m., there will be a Student Government Forum in the Ballroom of Ellis Hall. At this forum, a panel of student senators will be available to answer your questions on any of the decision-making that has taken place in this years Senate. These people are your elected representatives. If you do not like their positions on national politics, or their treatment of the media, stop in and ask them about it. Only by making them answer to you, can you insure their performance in your behalf.

Juniata Stomps Undefeated Westminster

by Tony Martuzas

The game was over. The clock silently ticked away the final minutes. Westminster was ahead by two points and were driving for another touchdown, which would have put the game hopelessly out of Juniata's reach. It has been four years since the Titans of Westminster suffered defeat on their own homefield. Their opponents from Huntingdon almost succeeded in humilating them, but with first down and ten to go, on the Indian eleven yard line, the chances were glum. Only a miracle could stop the threatening Westminster Offensive Machinery. The Juniata Defense produced the miracle.

With five minutes remaining in the game, Mark (Hamster, without the "p") Smallwood charged in and almost ripped the Titan quarterback's arm off, causing him to cough the ball up. Stu Jackson, who has been improving ever since the Albright victory, pounced on the football. Juniata's ball! !

Frosh quarterback, Dave Wickrowski led the inspired Offensive Unit onto the field. Three series earlier, Westminster picked up a safety when they had the Indians pinned down in the "coffin corner". The Titans were hoping for another two points, if not six.

Carm Defrancesco, playing with a battered knee churned out a couple yards. The next play, every member of the Offensive Team executed their assignments flawlessly. Tackle Charlie Zorger wheeled his man to the outside, Center Myers hammered the Middle Guard, Sean Ryan flattened his man on the trap block, guard Al Zubritsky and tight end Pete Lentini decked the linebackers, Mike McNeal chopped down his assigned man and Lou Ekerl steamed into the Titan safety. It was one-on-one; only the safety was between him and the goal line, ninety-two yards away.

Lou, with a great move, eluded his opponent and chugged desperately for the deciding touchdown. Titan defensive end Rod Chew excellently pursued the play and dragged Lou down on the one-yard line. On the next play, Sean Ryan, Steve Oak, and Don Myers plowed their opponents into the endzone and halfback McNeal slammed into his assignment, allowing Louie to bang into the endzone. The two point conversion was successful as Wickrowski hit his receiver Rudolph in the end zone.

With the Titans driving again, an Indian defender was detected holding his man and Westminster was rewarded a first down on their own 41-yard line. The vicious Indian Defense began hammering away. Titan receiver Baker was annihilated by Soph Steve Lehman. With fourth and short, halfback Scott Griffith, hero of last year's 22-7 rout over the Indians, crashed over for the first down. Then with two minutes remaining in the game suddenly linebacker Barry Hartley picked off Westminster's Steve Smith's pass. The small, faithful (and noisy) Juniata fans went beserk. Frosh Dave Wichrowski successfully ran out the clock. The bench went wild, Westminster, the mighty Titans which were ranked second in the nation (NAIA), were defeated.

The game was costly: speedster Carm Defrancesco may miss the remaining two games. Soph. Defensive End Don Leuber was carried off the field due to a ripped hamstring. With two games left, the Juniata players will need all the inspiration they can get as they attempt to win the Lambert Bowl and the MAC Northern Division race. I predict Wilkes will get bumped off. In the MAC's anything can happen.

It was heartening to see the small entourage of Juniata fans drowning out the more predominant crowd. It was more or less the Juniata vs. Wilkes game reversed. This time we can come out on top (I'm proud to say "we", because the players are representing "our" school).

I'm asking for all rowdy, ex-boy scouts, non-apathetic, fun-loving, Juniata students to assis. me in rounding up every last bass drum, bugles and what not in this area. The team needs all the support it can get and we need all the students to help out, even some to charter buses for the last away game. If you feel there's "nothing to do" at Juniata, why don't you support your team. A football game, or any sporting event is not a movie; you're not suppose to just sit, watch, and leave. Enjoy yourself, shout yourself hoarse, go "bananas". That's what extra-curricular college life is all about.

If you have no pride in your own school, no wonder "it stinks" and there's "nothing to do". Your school is in the midst of a championship and there's nothing more exciting than that. If I sound like a cheerleader, why not? Even cruel heartless, demanding Philadelphia Sports Writers are presently rooting for the Eagles, as well as the Flyers, Atoms, Phillies, and even the 76'ers (My God! Two wins and it's not even Thanksgiving!).

The semi-excited crowd at the Wilkes game is not enough to fire up the football team. I was there on the sidelines and only heard the Wilkes boosters thundering away and observed the Wilkes players playing like madmen.

What's needed for the remaining football games is a group of true-blooded American, Old-Fashioned, Rowdies. So far its me and Steve Townsend. Anyone else?

Sports Stumpin'

by Gary Gillen

Getting out of shape? Time to start losing that gut and working off that excess fat that you accumulated over the 1st 8 weeks of school? Well if your plans include a little work in the gym you might as well learn to love your body the way it is because in case you haven't noticed the gym is now closed from 4-9. Basketball is here and the gym now becomes the laboratory (put in terms so you science majors can understand) where the coaches hope to concoct a formula that will produce a winner at Juniata.

The problem as I see it, is not the use of the gym by the basketball team, nobody says anything while the football team ruins the baseball field, but more so the need for more facilities here at JC. The women's gym is a poor excuse for those who wish to get in a little exercise. My heart is with the poor wrestling team who is pushed over to the women's gym to practice. It's nice and warm but with cross country they can't take a shower after practice.

Lights on the athletic fields and tennis courts have been promised and now appear to fall into the inter-campus phone catogory in that you sit back and hope everybody forgets about it. The use of the gym by the basketball teams has just rekindled the flame that hopefully will drive somebody to take action in this matter.

With the recent Board of Trustees meetings ending there, wasn't any sign that the conditions will be changed. With the start of the Centennial Fund it appears that money coming into the school will go to the fund and not to the development of new faciliates. It is not my contention to sit back and criticize the basketball teams or anybody, not at this time anyway. If we want a winner here at JC we must be willing to sacrifice. I'm not sure why the gym has to be closed, but if it will make a difference, so be it. It is my contention that we could use some better facilities. . More hand ball courts is an example, but more so, a better all round building for indoor athletics, intramurals. I don't have the answer and I doubt anybody else does but I think it is time you start thinking about it and instead of complaining to your friends try and come up with an idea. If you do let me know and maybe we can get something going.

Intramurals End—Fall Champions

by Jaime' Belmont

Fall season intramuals are over for the year of 1973 at J.C. The final results are in from the playoffs.

The 6-man soccer league was won by Dunkles Dinks, just skining the Net Men with a score of 3-1. Team spirit and spectator support was the answer. When you know someone else cares and is rooting for you it's automatice to drive harder. It gives you the will to win. The four outstanding teams for this year are as follows:

Team	Wins	Losses
1) Dunkles Dinks	7	1
2) Net Men	7	1
3) N.J. House	2	4
4) Cripples III	1	5

The tennis courts will be a little quieter now that the tournaments are over. No more constant thrumming of the balls as they hit the rackets, and the students can get a little more sleep in the mornings. I'm afraid it's up to the freshman on campus to take off the muffle of silence. The funny thing about the tennis matches this fall is that the leaders in the beginning of the season continued to hold their titles to the end. Ed Podgorski, John Gujo, and Alice Herritt rode to glory.

ALABAMA, HERE WE COME !!

Juniata Drops Bridgeport, Heads for Stagg Bowl

by Tony Martuzas

Guess what! Juniata College is on the verge of winning a NATIONAL CHAMPIONSHIP. Y'know, the very same kind that gigantic Penn State University goes after, year after year. Penn State, Southern Cal., Notre Dame, and others can have the "Big Division I Championship". Others schools which are bigger than us, but not big enough to complete with the "biggies" comprise Division II. Teams in that division are such notables as the University of Delaware and Grambling College (incubator of future NFL "superstars"). Last, but not least, schools the size of Juniata, Slippery Rock, Lycoming, etc. are thrown together in Division III. Juniata will soon discover if it is "THE BEST SMALL COLLEGE FOOTBALL TEAM IN THE UNITED STATES". Our school is AUTOMATICALLY "THE SECOND BEST" team, despite Saturday's finish. But if you have a chance at being NUMBER ONE, why not take it?

The University of Bridgeport thought the game at JFK Stadium would be a joke. The people on the NCAA Division III Nominating Committee were worring if they had made a mistake by choosing a small school buried somewhere in the foothills of Central Pennsylvania. Bridgeport thought they'd have a picnic taking on "those jokers from Juniata". Bridgeport didn't get beat, they got hammered.

I do not have enough space to give a full account or dramatization of last Saturday's game. All I can say is: Juniata 35 Bridgeport 14. It was a sensational "team game".

It was a two-fold kind of victory; for one, Bridgeport, in their coaches own words, "We had our asses kicked in". secondly, the four thousand-plus Bridgeport "fans" were put to shame. Their roars were immediately drawned out by the vociferous JC fans and alumni as well. It was a spectacular experience. With the clock quickly running out, the fans exploded. It was sheer ecstasy. I can only remember everybody screaming; jumping up and down, sugging each other; it was complete hysteria. After calming down, I realized these people were jumping up and down for their school! I thought I would never see that day. I was under the impression that "good ol' school spirit" was just a faded memory.

All this time I was wrong; I wondered what possible means could pull this school together. I thought it could possibly be the campus radio station. I was so wrong! In the very same issue, hidden on the fourth page was a write-up on the football team. It had something to do with a "lambeau" or "lumppert" tyrophy. I did not know this entire season could wind up in a NATIONAL CHAMPIONSHIP played before television cameras. This team has miraculously pulled this school together. Well, at least in a little way. It was such an encouraging sight watching Juniata Students in far away Bridgeport, cheering and encouraging their team for a victory. It was a truly unbelievable sight.

Wittenberg is the toughest team ever to play Juniata on the football field. This team will not make the same mistakes Bridgeport made. They'll know what to expect and if (or when if you're a true-blue loyal Juniatian) we beat this tough physical team, Big Chief Crazy Donkey will sigle-handedly tear down the goalpost, dig a deep hole, and bury himself. What else could top a NATIONAL CHAMPIONSHIP in one's lifetime. Now you know how to get rid of a crazy mascot and part-time writer.

This Saturday's game in Phenix City, Alabama is for a National Championship. Don't save your money for next year, we may not be in an identical situation. This may be a once in a lifetime occurence. Your team is going to Alabama to claim a distinction which only one small college can proclaim. It will cost $42.95 (less than a roundtrip from Phila. to Montreal), additional meals and whatnot could bring this to $50. It's a

Frosh Seminar Enchants Kiddies With Magic Feats

by Rob Lopresti

Shakespeare, magic and children, all in Oller Hall at the same time? That's how it will be this Thursday and Friday at 1:00 p.m. when the Freshman Seminar in drama presents Prospero's Magic Cape, a children's play adapted from Shakespeare's The Tempest, by Lois Dean.

Mrs. Doris Goehring, leader of the seminar and director of the play says Prospero will be full of "magical" special effects to please the estimated 700 kids who will be attending. College students are, of course, more than welcome too. This is the third year the freshman seminar has presented a play for the elementary school children in the area, in order to give them a chance they might not otherwise have to see live drama.

This is the Seminar's second production of the year. The first was The American Dream by Edward Albee.

The cast consists of Stephen Hetrick, Dierdre Goodwin, Micheal Hanselman, Steven Bekoff, Robin Logue, Herman Klinger, Betty Harclerode, and Bruce Klabunde.

by Bruce Bordner

Magic will show it's splendor in Oller Thursday and Friday at 1:00.

Play Tryouts To Take Place

Professor Clayton Briggs announces open tryout dates for TOTEM THEATHER'S March production of Carl Zuckmayer's satire THE CAPTAIN OF KOPENICK. Students, faculty and staff are invited to attend one or more of the open tryout dates: Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday, December 11, 12, and 13 from 4:00 to 5:30 P.M. in Oller Hall. Previous experience is not necessary– only the desire to participate in one of the most amusing attacks against bungling bureaucracy that the stage has to offer. Delicious braggart parts for all. Gaudy Prussian uniforms, backed by stirring Prussian matial band music. Performed by the National Theater Company at the Old Vic Theater in London with Paul Scofield playing the Chaplinesque role of Voigt, the man without a country is heading for the campus boards.

Jack Troy Presents Readings

by J. G. McDonald

Jack Troy, a full-time potter and part-timep rofessor at Juniata College, will present a reading entitled "A Gallimaufry" Thursday December 6. The reading, in Juniata's Shoemaker Galleries, will include a "variety of prose and poetry by such diverse writers as Gregory Orr (a man whose name has never been uttered in this country) E. B. White, e.e. cummings, T. S. Eliot, James Dickey, and several others I could guarantee would start a huge fist fight if gathered in the same room." Mr. Troy said that he will also read from his own work including some recent material from his journals, poems, and a letter to an editor. Mr. Troy said, "A reading such as this is a good chance to share my enthusiasm for the written word with an audience who presumably has a similar appetite."

Troy is a former director of The English Conference Program and Assistant Professor of English at Juniata College. He also taught for two years in both the Art and English Departments. In 1970-71 he was a visiting professor at Kent State University where he taught ceramices. He presently teaches one course per term at Juniata College, "The Nature of Clay".

Mr. Troy's reading is being sponsored by Kvasir, the Juniata College literary magazine. The reading will be in Shoemaker Galleries on Thursday, December 6 at 8:15 p.m.

Charlie Chaplin, Buster Keaton Highlight Silent Movies Series

by Brad Rudy

There is usually little debate in the assertion that Charlie Chaplin is the greatest comic artist of the silent film era. He pulled comedy of the pure slapstick form into which it had degenerated and gave it a humanity and pathos that combined pity with humor into a virtual counterpart of the tragic catharsis - that is, Chaplin is usually so funny it hurts (emotionally, not physically). His little tramp has essentially become the trademark of his silent era.

Chaplin's tramp is much more human than Keaton's stoic would later be. While society would use Keaton as a "kicking post", it used Chaplin as a veritable "voodoo doll". Chaplin "sticks pins and needles" into his tramp, and, in so doing, tries to point out society's ills. The tramp is mercilessly besieged by both man (as in "Modern Times") and nature (as in "The Gold Rush"). He is in effect, the spokesman for the impoverished and trampled pre-depressionite.

But, it is not the societal themes Chaplin expresses that are central to his films, but the character with which he expresses them. It is the tramp that we come away remembering, not the overpowering machinery of "modern Times" not the freezing blizzards of the "Gold Rush". It's the little actions that make the Chaplin films: the eating of shoes, the forgotten New Year's Party, the trip through the enormous gears. Combined humor and pathos such as this is what gives Chaplin his profound richness. We laugh, but we feel guilty for laughing.

Chaplin films to be shown on campus will be "The Tramp", the short that created the famous character, a narrated condensed form of "The Gold Rush", and "Tillie's Punctured Romance", the first full length Chaplin feature, still greatly slapstick, but with the beginnings of Chaplin's art apparent. They will be shown Friday, December 7 at 8 pm in Oller Hall.

Buster Keaton, along with Charlie Chaplin and Harold Lloyd is considered one of the "triumvirate" of great silent comic artists. Of the three, he is perhaps the first to use film as a new and creative medium, using the camera to intensify his gags, his characters' emotions, indeed to tell its story.

The camera is almost forced to create all of the emotion in Keaton, because he doesn't show any on his face at all. Unlike his two contemporaries, emotion is secondary to Keaton. He never shows any emotion, no matter what the stimulus is. For example, in "The Ballonitic" he falls through a funhouse trapdoor, lands on the street outside and has a 600 pound woman land right on top of him without batting an eyelash. Keaton is the perennial "kicking post" of society, of nature, and of virtually his total environment, yet he can take a stoic "what the hell can I do about it?" attitude and always bounces back for more. Who else would start walking down an empty track to retrieve his hijacked train, and who else would succeed (sort of)?

Keaton tends to underscore his lack of emotionalism with his pictures of femininity. He puts all his women on pedestals, but takes careful pains to show that that is the last place they belong. His women are all sexless, brainless, idiots. This is particularly evident with Annabell Lee from "The General". She is the type of girl who would sweep all the "little pieces of wood" from the train's engine, leaving it without fuel, yet Keaton can still get a hernia carrying her massive belt across the swamp.

It is impossible in this short space to explain all the innuendoes of Buster Keaton, and this sketchy article should hardly suffice. In essence, though, Keaton is one of the greatest film and comic artists of all time and should not be missed. Examples of his work that will be shown are the short "The Balloonatic" and the feature length "The General". They will be shown Tuesday December 11 at 8:00 P.M. in Alumni Hall.

Editorial

by Alice Boomhower

I guess that in my first editorial I should talk about my journalistic philosophies, but that seems pretty ridiculous since if you're really interested in journalism, you're on the staff already, and you know my philosophies anyway. So, I'll just say that I've made a policy of a two-column limit on any articles not written by members of the staff. I made this rule because I have been receiving a large number of letters to the Editor, and can't possibly print all of them, so, in the interest of fairness, I am limiting the amount of space any one person can have. Also, if you'd like to help the Juniatian in any way, or comment on our finished product, just stop me and tell me what's in your head.

Now that that's out of the way, I think the best thing to do would be to try to explain what the editorial board has set up to make the Juniatian at least slightly more interesting. This week we are featuring the football team. I personally am not a big fan of the football team, and really don't know any of the "jocks" very well, so what I say, or what anyone says, is subjective.

There seems to be a gap on this campus between the so-called "jocks" and the rest of the students. There are other gaps too, but somehow they just aren't as wide. Football is, though, an important part of life to many students, and the team has certainly done well (an understatement) this year. So, in fairness to these people the staff has tried to dedicate this paper to their efforts. Now let's go against Wittenberg.

Also, this past weekend I spent in Washington D.C. at a National Student Association Conference. One workshop I attended was very valuable, and made me question the purpose that this newspaper has on the Juniata campus. I believe that this conference has changed my ideas about a campus newspaper and that I will be able to relate some of these changes in future editorials.

There is a great deal of news on this campus that is not of the "cutesy" variety, and that would be interesting to those who normally do not read this newspaper. I learned how to investigate these stories and hope that I will be able to relay this knowledge to my staff. I also attended several other workshops on various subjects and hope to deal with these in future papers.

The National Student Association (NSA) appears to be a valuable organization, although I must say that the organization of the conference could have been better. On the whole, I got a lot out of the conference and hope that this information will help me in my term as editor.

great bargain. If you're short of money, see Deans Shunk, Robinson, or Gabriel and take out an emergency loan. You can repey that amount within 30 days. There is probably one reason you can't go besides not caring; you're one of those many students who "blew their wad" last Saturday.

Here's your last chance to see the best team ever in Juniata's History. Here's your chance to go to Alabama and witness a NATIONAL CHAMPIONSHIP. I hope to see you there in Phenix City.

As Coach Nadzak said, "Ten weeks ago, all this was a dream. After Wilkes, it was shattered. But now, we're so close you can just reach out and grab it (NCAA DIVISION III CHAMPIONSHIP). You have to grab it while you can".

Letters to the Editor

Letters to the editor should be addressed to: Editor, The Juniatian, Box 667, Juniata College, Huntingdon, Pa. 16652. The editors reserve the right to print only non-libelous and responsible content and to edit all letters and commentaries submitted to The Juniatan. The staff also reserves the right to publish all full signatures unless the writer can supply valid reason for omitting his name.

I apologize to Prof. Hochberg on the misprint in his letter concerning the slave auction. The phrase was "charity pogram", not program. A pogram is an officially encouraged massacre or persecution of a minority group. Prof. Hochberg suggested this instead of a slave auction. I personally apologize to Prof. Hochberg, this misprint was my mistake, and I realize that it ruined the context of his letter.

AEB

I wish to discuss the evaluation of my teaching of the course, MA-308, Numerical Analysis, which appeared last spring in "The Student Speaks: Course Evaluation, Juniata College, 1972-73.'"

All four students in the course responded (not four out of five). Every written comment by every student on every question follows:

23. Comment on this course.

"Anyone taking this course must take full responsibility for getting the work done and understanding what is going on because the prof makes no effort to determine whether the students are learning the material." "Does not contain much material to think about, deals mostly with how to run formulas." "Difficult material to understand. I didn't have the time which I would have needed to understand all the material." "This course should only be taken by those interested in learning the subject matter. Dr. Blaisdell explains things thoroughly but sometimes I feel he loses the class's interest by writing too much on the board; i.e. everything he says."

24. Comment on the professor.

"The prof leaves the responsibility for understanding the material squarely on the shoulders of the student." "Should have brought in outside material for lectures." "Very interested in students. I like his teaching because he derives things for you and doesn't just throw equations at you."

25. One specific thing he did particularly well.

"He did many of the problems."

26. What might he have done to improve his teaching of the course?

"He could try to determine how much difficulty the students are having with the assigned problems."

The responses to a selection of the check list questions follows:
In the interests of brevity I have selected only those questions which I regard as most significant for the evaluation of teaching ability. I have similar data on all the other questions and would be glad to show it to any interested person. Following each response there appears in parentheses, in order, the percent of students giving that response in Numerical Analysis and the percentage of all students in all courses reported in "...Course Evaluation. Juniata College, 1972-73." (disregarding "no basis for judgment").

8. Were the lectures on seminar discussions understandable?
Always (25, 40). Frequently (50, 18), Rarely (0, 3).

9. Has the course increased your interest in the field so as to take further related courses or do reading on your own? Yes (100, 59) No (0, 39).

14 Did the professor create enthusiasm for the material? Always (0, 17), Frequently (50, 37), Sometimes (50, 33), Rarely (0, 13).

16. Was the professor available and helpful outside of class?
Available and helpful (75, 87), Available but not helpful (0,8), Not Available (25, 5).

17. How would you rate the professor compared to others you have had in the same department? Excellent (0, 25), Above average (75, 38), Average (25, 28), below average (0, 8).

18. How would you rate the prosor compared to other professors you have had in other departments? Excellent (25, 25), Good (25, 42), Average (50, 24), Below average (0, 10).

19. Would you recommend the professor, because of his teaching, to other students planning to take this course? Yes (75, 70), No (25, 26).

I now report the statement that appears in "...Course Evaluation... 1972-73" purpoting to be a summary of this data.

"GENERAL COMMENTS: Dr. Blaisdell's inability to teach is further substantiated from the responses of his students in this course. He seems to have an extremely difficult time keeping the classes' interest in the subject matter during the lecture period. Perhaps this is due to the material not being very thought provoking in the first place. Perhaps it lays in the professor's attitude. 'Anyone taking this course must take full responsibility for getting the work done and understanding what is going on because the professor makes no effort to determine whether the students are learning the material.' We feel it is a culmination of factors. Therefore, if the material is as difficult as the students stated, then the course is being taught by the wrong man. Yet, it seems that the professor is running out of courses that he is able to teach properly. He is either in the wrong profession or in the wrong institution, for there is no excuse for an instructor to be teaching with such negative ability.

Perhaps we could recommend retirement."

I charge that this "summary" is false in fact and malicious in intent. I have written this lengthy letter be-cause I agree with Spinoza that "He whose honor depends on the opinion of the mob must day by day strive with the greatest anxiety, act, and scheme in order to retain his reputation. For the mob is varied and inconstant and therefore if a reputation is not carefully preserved it dies quickly." and with Shakespeare that "Good name in man and woman, dear my lord/ Is the immediate jewel of their souls;/ Who steals my purse steals trash; 'tis something, nothing/...But he that filches from me my good name/ Robs me of that which no enriches him/ And makes me poor indeed." (Supporting statements courtesy Bartlett's "Quotations")

I believe that students deserve full, accurate and fair reporting of student opinion on courses and teachers. I applaud the student initiative and energy which produced the first "Course Evaluation, Juniata College." But I regret that this first effort did injury to me and thus injury to the credibility of the whole report. I hope that this year's committee will be diligent in repairing the reputation of the publication and that both they and I will find that Lamb was wrong in believeing that Reputation lost comes not again."

KVASIR KORNER

"A Case of An Alien Delicacy"

by Mark Martin

"Good morning, sir," said Lieutenant Blackman.

"Good morning, Lieutenant," replied the General.

"I have that tape of Captain Johnson's. Would you like to hear it now, sir?"

"Yes, Lieutenant. I've been anxious for many years to find out what happened to my former roommate at the academy. It's too bad we lost him. He was a good man."

"Yes, he was, sir."

Then, after a pause: "How did you say you happened to find the tape?"

"Well, sir, we were on a mission to planet X428 and we decided to stop over at planet Y346 for a short rest. While we were exploring the planet, we came upon Captain Johnson's spacesuit in a cave along with this tape. We also found his ship three miles away."

"I see. Plant Y346 is where the Admalons live, isn't it?"

"Yes, sir."

"Okay, then. Start the tape."

The Lieutenant unfolded the protective covering from the tape cartridge. He put the tape in the machine and pushed the playback button. There was a pause, a click, and then the following words.

This is Captain Johnson of the U.S.S. Nemo. Due to unknown engine trouble, my crew and I were forced to crash-land on this uncharted planet. The ship is completely useless and the entire crew either died instantly or shortly after the crash. Therefore, I am the only survivor, but perhaps not the only inhabitant on this planet.

The area that I am now in is a jungle paradise with some quite unusual varieties of plantlife. The atmosphere is breathable and the temperature bearable. It's raining hard now and I must get away from the ship. I have detected a severe radiation leak from engine No. 3. I'm badly cut and bruised, but I think I can make it to some rock formations that I see ahead. I'll sign off now for a few minutes and then continue my report when I'm under shelter.

13 to 15 hours later

Some strange events have occurred since I made my last entry in the recorder-log. I underestimated the distance to the rock formations and over-estimated my remaining strength. I was just about there and near the point of complete exhaustion when a tremor shook the earth. I turned around just in time to see the the ship rise up in the air and then suddenly explode into a million pieces. Fortunately at the time I was far enough away from the explosion. But the explosion of the ship sent out a huge ball of flame enveloping the jungle in a firey torrent. I turned away from the flames and desperately tried to crawl away. At that instant I saw, or seemed to see, the rock shrink back. It actually seemed to move! I then collapsed and fell into unconsciousness.

I awoke to find myself lying in a low type of hut. It's about 10 feet square and 5 feet high. I can't even stand up, it's so low. The sides are made of a tough, sinewy, fibrous vine-like material. The ceiling is composed of large thick leaves. At the opposite end of the hut is an opening. The thing that impresses me most about this hut is that it seems to have been built on the spur of the moment and only as a temporary dwelling. The whole thing is rather crude and appears to have been just thrown together.

Hold it! I hear someone or something approaching. This is Captain Johnson signing off for now.

More strange events have happened. The someone or something slowly came into view, bit by bit. When I could see it as a whole, I realized that it was the rock I had seen move earlier. Now it was moving towards me. It was about 4 feet high, which explained the lowness of the hut. There was a slit near the top and something shaped like a pouch directly beneath it. The whole thing appeared to be made out of silicon. As for any particular shape, there wasn't any; it was just a blob a material. It moved by first leaning forward and then pulling its rear end up behind it. It was a clumsy, sort oflurching movement, but it seemed to be effective. In the pouch were some small rocks. As it came towards me, it made a rasping or wheezy sound.

I immdiately panicked, for the thing was grotesque. Then suddenly, I felt as if the creature was also scared, but yet trying to be friendly. I myself must have appeared frightening to it. It came within two feet of me and then the pouch turned inside out, allowing the rocks to fall out. I was confused, but then it crawled on top of one of the rocks, made a small sucking sound, moved off, and the rock was gone! Again there was that rasping, wheezy sound. Apparently it meant for me to eat the rocks. I picked up one of them and tried to bite into it. But it was useless; the rocks here are just as hard as those back home. It really seemed to shock "her" when I tried to eat the rock with my mouth (I'm not sure why, but this creature just seems to be a female to me). I guess she thought I should sit on the rock, like she did.

How could I ever communicate with her? She certainly could not speak the same language as myself. As for teaching her how to speak English, that seemed to be completely out of the question. She definately did not have the correct vocal apparatus to speak words as we know them. The only apparent sounds she could make were the ones I've already described.

In desperation to try to make her understand, I dropped the rock, pulled a leaf down from the ceiling, held it out to her, and then took a bite out of it. I know it was a gamble to eat an unknown plant, but it was the only thing I could think of to do. However, it did work. Slowly she seemed to realize that this was the type of food I could consume. The leaf did taste all right, by the way; at least I haven't had any ill effects yet. It had a sort of starchy, potato-like taste. It filled me up fast, too. I then pushed the rocks aside, pulled some more leaves down from the ceiling, and put them in her pouch. I did this so as to show her that she should bring me leaves instead of rocks. Apparently it worked as she has brought me leaves ever since.

After she seemed satisfied that I was taken care of, she started to leave. But I called out to her and leaned forward to touch her on the "back." She was a little frightened at first, but she soon turned around till the slit was again facing me. I was still badly injured and in need of medical care. Since my first aid kit was gone, she was the only one who could help me.

She apparently thought that this was the way I was supposed to look—all cut and bruised. I compared the gash in my one arm with the unbroken surface of my other arm. I then held out the injured arm to her. What came next really amazed me. She came closer to my outstretched arm and then opened that slit. At first I thought she was going to bite my arm off, but she gently pressed the open slit against the gash and began to clean the wound. She then put an oozy substance over the wound. She did the same thing to all my injuries. It really seemed to help, too. There's no more pain and the wounds look like they'll heal. Amazing! I must find out more about that miracle slit. She then left.

I sat thinking for a few minutes and then crawled over to the opening. Outside was the same sort of paradise I had seen before. To the left of me was another hut like the one in which I now sat. I could hear more of the same type of voices as my "nurse's" coming from the other hut. After listening for awhile, I could distinguish four different voices, one of them being the female creature. I could barely detect some emotions in their voices. They seemed to be arguing about something—maybe me.

One thing still puzzles me though. When the female creature first came in, I sensed a feeling of fright, but also of wanting to help me, to be a friend. Could she be telepathic? I don't know for sure, but right now that's the only answer I can give. Maybe more on that later. Also, how and why did she bring me to this hut? I've found a red bruised spot on my ankle. Did she drag me here by grasping my ankle in that slit? It's hard to say. As to why she brought me here, I think I know the reason why. As I look outside the hut, I see a fire that the female creature has been tending. She seems to know its dangers and respects it. The way I see it, she knew that I would be killed by the spreading fire. So, she brought me here. We both had a common knowledge of fire, a stroke of luck in my favor. I suppose she might also have a friendly nature.

2 days later

So as to be able to record everything I observe, I'll have to limit the length and number of my entries. To start right off, not much has been happening. I've been recuperating in the hut. "Flo" (the female creature) has been in to see me only once since the first time we met. Again I detected emotions inside my mind; never words, just feelings. This time she stayed only a very short time and seemed anxious to leave. I'm pretty sure now that she's slightly telepathic. Whether or not I myself send out emotions, I don't know.

I've met the other three creatures. They're slightly larger than Flo, but still composed of the same silicon-like material. They could be males, but again I'm not sure. They only regard me as a curious freak. They seem to be interested in something else. By the way, one of them has a serious-looking gash in his side which appears to have been recently treated by the same method as my wounds. Now I can see how Flo understood that I was wounded, too. Again, it was a common experience. I see now that this is perhaps the first step towards communication with an alien creature. But, why is this male creature wounded? I have to sign off now. Be back as soon as I can.

3 hours later

We've just destroyed our campsite and are now moving on to somewhere else. The three larger creatures just walked over the huts, smashing them flat. They then nudged me over to the remains of the huts, picked up some of the branches in their slits, and scattered them through the jungle. Taking this as an indication to help, I bent down and did so.

Now we've been on the road for about two and a half hours. If I walk at a normal rate, the creatures seem to have little difficulty in keeping up with me. However, they do seem to be tiring fast. They haven't eaten for a long time. Whether this is natural or not is hard to say. As for myself, I've had plenty to eat. There's an abundance of new kinds of fruit in this paradise.

Where we're headed to, I have no idea. These creatures must be nomadic. It's strange, too, that we move only at night. I think we're going to make camp soon. This is Captain Johnson signing off for now.

4 (?) hours later

I feel my life is near its end, so I must make this entry fast—it may be my last.

We set up camp under a thick overgrowth of vines at the first sign of morning. After everyone else was asleep, I walked outside and climbed a tree to try to see what was up ahead. After seeing nothing, I started to climb back down. On the way back down, my leg slipped and I fell to the ground, snapping my leg in two. It was a compound fracture and very painful. I cried out with pain, disturbing the others. Flo was the first to come out. She waddled over, took one look at my leg, and shrank back. I felt something "click" in her mind. The other three creatures hurried out. When they saw my leg, they suddenly went mad and began attacking me. I was barely able to kick them away with my good leg and crawl off into the jungle.

Now I am sitting in a cave. My leg's in extreme pain. It's no easy thing to move with a broken leg. I don't know where the others are. Flo seems to have stayed at the camp. But the others have been hunting me like a wild beast. All these things make no sense, whatsoever.

I feel I can no longer run front

by Gary Gillen

Wake up Juniata, Remember that? Well I guess I kinda goofed on that one. So it is, Alabama Here We Come. After the Indian victory over Bridgeport anything can happen and don't be to surprised if Juniata is the first Division III playoff champion.

Well, enough for football, the guys really are doing a great job and deserve all the credit and support we can give them, but we are entering the 2nd phase and new sports are now getting the picture.

The intra-mural program, which has developed into a real success, is in full swing of the 2nd term with a variety of sports. Basketball, volleyball, handball, badminton, wrestling, pool, paddleball and skiing are all scheduled. There ought to be at least something for everybody who wants to get a little exercise and I'm sure suggestions for new programs would be welcomed at the Intra-mural Office. Games will be starting this week so if you get a break, walk over and see the program in action. Besides you might just get lucky and get on a winning team and get your picture in the Juniatian. Now I ask you what more could you want?

With the 2nd team we also have varsity basketball, both men and women and wrestling. The teams should be an improvement over last year and hopefully will follow in the winning steps of the football team and bring some more excitement to Juniata. The season didn't start off to well for either the basketball or wrestling teams as the basketball team lost to Delaware Valley and the wrestling team didn't show to well in a tournament last weekend in Lebanon Valley. The high spot of the wrestling team was Myron Zimmerman's 4th place finish. The basketball team takes on Susquahanna here Wednesday night and could use the support of the student body.

With the many sports intra-mural and varsity, on campus there is a need for more sports reporters to give ample coverage to sports. So I make a plea to anyone who is willing to write to contact me at P.O. 1024 or 643-1602. No experience is necessary as I'm sure we all benefit from the Writing Program. You wouldn't have to write every week but help is definitely needed. Thanks.

these insane monsters. If they find me, they'll probably eat me alive. If this tape is found without me, it can be assumed that I am dead. Give my love to ....

(Editor's note: Being of a personal nature, the above names were omitted from the text. Soon after this part, the tape runs out.)

"That's it, sir."

"Yes. Now I finally know what happened to the Captain. I think we can assume that the Admalons finally found him. Had you listened to the tape before today?"

"Yes, sir."

"Did you do any research?"

"Yes, I did, sir. I found in the records of the Admalon's museum an account of three escaped prisoners. Their time of escape and area traveled corresponds with the approximate crash-time of Captain Johnson and the area in which his spacesuit was found. And, oh yes. There are also reports of a female traveling with the three males.

"Well, then that accounts for Flo and why they traveled only at night. That one male creature was probably wounded in their escape. Now if only Johnson had known what we know today about the Admalons."

"What's that, sir? I don't quite follow you."

"Didn't you find out anything else about those Admalons?"

"No, sir."

"Well, you see, those metal-eating Admalons are very unusual creatures. Johnson began to see that they were probably starving. To him, the jungle was a paradise —plenty to eat. But to the Admalons, it was like a desert—no metals. In fact, a desert would have been better because it would have had some minerals in it. But what Captain Johnson didn't know was what their favorite food is. It's no wonder they went mad when they saw that bone protruding through Johnson's skin. Calcium to them is quite a rare delicacy."

Student Government will open the Crafts Room this week during the dinner hours of 5:30 to 6:30 for the making of signs in preparation for Saturday's football game. Paint, paper, and magic markers will be available for making the signs.

NSA Conference Proves Valuable

Last weekend I attended the National Student Association Conference, of which I spoke in my editorial. Now I would like to tell you just what this organization is for, and why Juniata is a member. After all, if we're paying for belonging, we should know the reasons. The NSA is an idealistically liberal organization, but realistically they are fairly conservative. The organization tries to support students from member colleges in attempts at new projects on campus. They are available to help any member student. The organization now is helping the student movement for the impeachment of the President, the gay revolution, the women's coalition, and working with student legal rights. NSA also, offers programs for students so that they can purchase items; like records, books, and bikes, at lower cost. Our Student Government is now looking into these possibilities.

Energy Crisis Prompts Action At JC With New Energy Commission

by David Mitchell

The energy crisis has made its presence felt across the nation in past months with cutbacks occurring in gasoline sales, the scarcity of available fuel oil, and increased pleas to conserve electricity. The energy crisis has made its presence felt here, too, on the Juniata College campus. A number of students, faculty members, and members of JC's staff have joined together in an effort to help deal with our present and future situation.

Student Sam Sirianni and Dr. Pfrogner of the physics department are co-chairman of the Energy Conservation Board, a student-faculty organization designed to investigate ways of dealing with the present fuel shortage and its effects upon campus, and to create an awareness among the student body that a real crisis does exist and what measures we must take to stave off its effects.

The fuel oil shortage is definitely a very real situation. Last month, Juniata College received only one half of their normal fuel oil shipment from Baltimore. Fortunately, the weather proved to be unusually mild for the month of November and did not create an urgent need for the missing fuel. Yet, if this type of situation continues, will Juniata College be able to operate and continue to remain open for the rest of the winter term?

In answer to this question, Sam Sirianni says, "As of right now, no, we cannot see any reason for Juniata to have to close down for any length of time during the winter term. But this does not mean that there is no chance, there will always be a chance. And what basically is going to determine our energy situation at the moment is the type of weather we are going to have for the remainder of the winter and what steps students are willing to take to cut back in the usage of all forms of energy here on campus."

The energy crisis is not something to be taken lightly. For many students, the closing down of the campus for part of the winter term would have damaging effects. Closing during the winter term would mean an extension of the spring term, overlapping into summer and causing many students to lose badly-needed summer jobs to others who would be available for work earlier. Also for the ones who can work, their earning period would be cut considerably resulting in loss of funds for the next school year.

What can the ordinary student do about the situation? Admittedly, there is not much one person can do, but every little bit helps. Turning off unnecessary lights and keeping windows closed are two measures which when practiced in mass, does conserve energy. Any persons having problems with too much heat should ask the custodian to adjust thermostats. The student government has passed a resolution asking students not to use Christmas lights this winter, instead use some other form of decoration. Hopefully, in the near future, plastic storm windows will be distributed to the students to help trap escaping heat from around window sills.

Other measures being considered include turning down the temperature of the hot water and using a minimum of light bulbs in dorm halls and stairwells. Although it has been appreciated that many dorms have discontinued use of hall lights, a minimum of lights must be kept in every hall according to insurance rules. Soon, dorm representatives are going to be giving energy conserving measures to dorm resdents in hope that they will be observed.

The energy crisis is real and it's here affecting each and every one of us.

We as a college community must do our best and our part in helping to see that our energy is used wisely.

Prison Change Is Theme For Concert And Talks

By Alice Boomhower

What are you doing this weekend? Bet there's a million Christmas parties, and you're really glad that there's going to be something to do this weekend, right? But, wait just a minute! There's something to do other than the proverbial Christmas Party, and it won't even interrupt that.

Initiated By Professor Geibel, there will be a benefit concert with the basic theme of Prison Change. There will be four acts playing for the concert(now really, when was the last time you heard of four bands playing at Juniata at one time?). Also included in the program will be several speakers. One of them, Charlie Joe, was the youngest inmate at Attica during the uprising. Another, Jim Zimmerman runs the Harrisburg Independent Press, and has helped to organize many movements in the Harrisburg area. Finally, Bob Moore will talk on what Viet Nam Vets Against the War are doing now.

The four groups will be: Rank Strangers, a group composed of former inmates of the Ohio State Penetentary. They play rock music, and have been well received on many Ohio college campuses. Home-Grown is a band from Harrisburg. They play folk, bluegrass, and original tunes. Lipp and Lisak, another folk group, performs original tunes also. Finally, Brenda Woodrum, is a country and western singer.

This program all starts in Oller Hall at 7:30 on Saturday evening. it has been scheduled early, so as not to conflict with the Christmas spirits. A great deal of work has been put into this program by Professor Geibel, and it should be worthwhile. Following the concert there will be a reception for those who would be interested in talking with the performers on a personal basis. This will be held in Tote.

If anyone would like to help out in this effort, contact professor Geibel. There is an urgent need for a floor, a sleeping bag, or an empty bed to house the performers for both Saturday and Sunday evenings.

Abuse The Cable Service —You May Lose Privilege

A few years ago, there were no televisions on the Juniata campus. Then, the Student Council requested the Huntingdon Cable Co. to extend their services onto campus. The Student Council agreed to police the cable, to help protect the company.

Now, many Juniata students enjoy a TV set in their rooms. However, there is a continuing problem with abuse of the cable by college students. Remembering that when a privilege is abused, it is often taken away, it is time for action on the part of all concerned students.

Mr. Isett of the Huntingdon Cable Co points out that the cables and wiring on campus are still the private property of the company, and no business can survive if they allow constant and uncontrolled damage to be inflicted on their property. He further noted, that a television cable is a part of the communications system, and under the jurisdiction of the FCC.

There are several types of abuse occuring on campus. There has been vandalism and theft of the company's property. Also, there have been illegal hookups. It is illegal to tap into a line or add additional appliances, such as a stereo or extra television to a previous legal hookup. If you wish to add your stereo to your TV hookup, it costs $10 for installation, and there is no additional monthly charge.

The legal penalties for these abuses vary according to the magistrate who handles the case, but they often can be very severe.

There are several things students can do to help keep our privilege of having televisions in our rooms. If you see any destruction or theft of the Cable Company's property, report it immediately. If you discover anyone who has an illegal hookupo, warn them, and if they don't undo it, report them. You'll only be doing yourself a favor.

JC Renews Old Tradition Of Xmas Madrigal Dinner

An old tradition is going to be renewed at Juniata on the evening of Tuesday, December 18 when we have our Christmas Madrigal Dinner. For years this dinner highlighted the Juniata Christmas season, and this year the Special Events Committee is renewing the tradition in hopes of regaining a bit of the old fashioned Christmas Spirit. The dinner is a special occasion, in that it is semi-formal and is a sit down, candlelight affair. With it being a sit down dinner in the Ellis Hall Dining Room, only 500 students can attend. Tickets are available on a first come, first serve basis at the Information Desk and it is requested that you come personnaly for your ticket. For those who do not get a ticket, the same meal will be served in the Lesher basement dining hall.

The entertainment will begin with a choral ensemble singing a multide of Christmas carols. The evening will be highlighted by a reading of The Night Before Christmas, performed by Dr. Doyle. Not on the program but bound to be entertaining will be the faculty, who serve the meal to the students. The dining hall will be decorated with a Christmas tree supplied by the food service along with decorations done by the classes. If you are interested in helping to decorate please contact Sam Sirianni (643-9909).

Masque Theater Presents Student-Run Productions

by Sue Leffard

For all you folks interested in theater, there are student productions of two one-act plays and a short reaser's thearer. "The Proposal" by Anton Chekhov and "The Sandbox" by Edward Albee plus "in Grande Illusion" by Brad Rudy are coming at 8:15 in Oller Hall on December 17 and 18. "The Proposal" is about a hypochondriac trying to propose to his lady. "The American Dream" is an expansion of ideas in "The Sandbox." Both these plays are comedies. Brad's "In Grande Illusion" is something a little different. He has taken parts of literature and put them together for the anti-war theme of the reader's theater.

There are about twenty students involved in this student run theater. Mrs. Goehring is serving as a technical advisor to the group. If you are interested in working with this group talk to Brad Rudy, Sue Schuldiner of David Brown. Remember that the theater is much more than just actors. There is stage crew, scenery, design, make-up, and publicity.

The groip hopes to have a play each term, but to do so the group really needs student support as both audience and participators. A big audience would really boost the group's morale. A theater group is different from an ordinary interest group: it takes both the group and an audience. So it is up to the student body if they want to have a theater group.

by Bruce Bordner

This is one of the plays to be presented next Monday and Tuesday by the Masque Theater group.

Intramurals

On Wednesday, December 12, the winter intermural program will begin. In all there will be 21 basketball teams and 33 volleyball teams competing for a total of six championships. The Juniata Staff at this time would like to wish all teams good luck as they compete for these coveted winter championships.

We apologize to the Football team for the gross error in the last Juniatian. It seems that we got the wrong picture for the front page and printed a picture of the Wilkes game, and not the Bridgeport game. It was still a good play, but we wish to apologize to the team for the mistake. Also, to commend them for the brilliant win in Conn.

Nixon's the One

Ask a mathematics man; he'll tell you that a zero is closer to being positive than a negative. What I'm talking about, of course, is Nixon, Many feel that many of the eminent possibilities to replace this man may turn out to be "zeroes"; that is, once in office they couldn't or wouldn't do much. People seem to be afraid of this, though we have a know "negative" in the form of Nixon.

How people voted for him in the first place is incredible (though I realize McGovern's relative incompetence). With a past history of corruption, dishonesty, and lies, people accepted him as a great savior. They seem to have forgotten Nixon and McCarthyism, the truth behind his checkers speech, the dirty tricks campaigns that ruined the best candidates for the last election (he couldn't be ignorant of that, it was too public), his "October 9th" speech— remember? The list can be easily expanded.

Perhaps, for instance, his money and property deals, and so on, aren't impeachable offenses in and of themselves, but a man such as this isn't any angel. I believe Nixon's guilty in quite a number of ways.

I noticed in a letter by a "little freshman" (his own words) that he seems to believe impeachment would result in humiliation for the country. That sounds like the strange way Nixon's mind must work. Really, we must remember that other countries are rather aware of what is happening in this country and that a large number of foreign citizens are incredulous that we haven't ousted Nixon. In fact, I'd say many of them are downright disgusted. Our only real way to "save face" is to prove the Democratic process— Impeach Nixon.

I'd like to add a last word about these "missing tapes— A.) Nixon had experts working on his recording system. Can anyone really believe they let those two phone conversations slip by? B.) Nixon claimed he sent for them when he agreed to make transcripts, and that they weren't there. I believe that anyone with an I.Q. over that of a banana tree would have taken a long, hard look at those tapes when this whole situation came out, quite a while ago — if not before. If those tapes were really not recorded, Nixon would have known a long time ago. As it turns out, the government claims that someone (I think it was Halderman, I'm not sure) checked the tapes out and never returned them — which is pretty damn incriminating by itself.

In other words, the whole thing smells, so, I hope that people wake up more and start insisting on honesty and humanity in office— it's about time.

Dr. Crouch Speaks

Dear Reader:

The Fall Term at Juniata has been a reasonably pleasant one. Sunshine, winning football, attendance in classes satisfactory, even an occasional smile from the bosses, but regardless of all this, I am thoroughly disgusted with several situations on this campus. I am not sure what good "airing" my gripes will do but I'm going to try.

First, I'd like to challenge the cigarette smoker. I am not going to preach health to you.....certainly if science can not persuade you that there are reasons to stop then I can not be expected to succeed. What I am going to ask is why must I suffer from your pleasure? Why is it that your desire to smoke is so strong that it outweighs any consideration you might have as to whether your smoke is offensive to me? Why is it that my appreciation of clean air and clean surroundings means not one damn thing to you when you decide that you must smoke? Those who chose to smoke the other night in Ellis Ballroom during the Witches and Demon Lecture gave not one thought to the possibility that there could have been persons present who not only did not like the odor but whose health might be affected.

my-o-pic-opin-ations: unduly adhering to one's own judgment after looking at the thing up painfully close.

I loathe names like Rip Torn... Candy Darling...Jewel Walker.. they sort of get sticky between the mental toes.

Spending an evening with Jewel sounds sort of fun like watching 'Jackie Gleason' on television but it isn't, if Thursday night was your night out. It is nearing vacation time and I believe we're all a little tired of playing games...particularly guessing games...like if I can guess how much you get paid for doing whatever it is you're doing... do I get a refund on the time I waste for watching you?

I got a long white, scotch tape sealed envelope posted in my campus mailbox last week. Inside was discovered a small paper tab which Salada Tea attaches to each and every one of their tea bags. It seems they have gone into printing little observations on the alternate side of the little tags and this one had the pansophy "the goal of criticism is to leave the person with the feeling that he's being helped." ....exactly my sentiments...I always feel a little better when I say what I thing...it helps me breathe better after this stifling troposphere of marshmallow urbanities.

I don't know who does your murdering for you but when the name on needle is yours, it's time you thought about supporting the habit when you're several years out from under Pop's checking account. It's not the hard stuff that's habit forming, it's the state of mind that it induces. You get booked on 'arcadia' and watch yourself slice off pieces of your flesh to keep the mind sanitariumed there. As a coal rip take away someone's cigarettes for a day and watch as they become obsessed with bartering their souls for the neatly packaged weeds. Don't ask whose wrinating in your head, it's you.

No matter how exciting the program 'sounds'...if the people serving it up are tone deaf...we're in trouble.

DISCUSSION

by Rick Boyer

"Baron von Tollbooth and the Chrome Nun" represents yet another project by those two arch-insurgents of rock, Grace Slick and Paul Kantner. David Freiberg, although credited as an equal partner on the album cover, exposes a minimal amount of his talent, leaving Grace and Paul to unleash their emotional wrath.

This album does not have a thematic concept as did "Sunfighter" and "Blows Against the Empire." Paul Kantner, the real genius behind these individual projects and most of the Jefferson Airplane's (now defunct) material, still writes songs in his near documentary style. "Sketches of China," the excellent closing song, exemplifies this style beautifully. The theme of "it ain't what you want, it's what you need" is carried through three mini epics of various notables who existed in ancient China. The line "I'd rather be here than yesterday" is interesting in that it represents a curious department from Kantner's previous themes on "Sunfighter" and "Blows...", where he issued pleas for youth to revert back to "the beginning" when "we all were one spirit in all of our bodies." "White Boy" is another extension of Kantner's "Have You Seen the Saucers?" science fiction concepts; this time dealing with the idea of alien intervention in the growth of civilization.

"Your Mind Has Left You Body" is Paul's only other song on the album and probably his best. True to the title, the music is gloomy and sullen. Jerry Garcia's pedal-steel guitar seems to float around Kantner's moody vocal. Grace Slick's backup vocal is stunningly recorded — sounding like she's singing from the depths of a tunnel. Jorma Kaukonen's guitar explosion is also excellent. All these elements combine to form a unique song — one of the high points of the album.

Enter: Grace Slick; whose voice was an invaluable asset for the Airplane and whose material is distinctive from any other female's (or male's for that matter) in rock music. "Across the Board" is her best vocal exhibition since maybe "White Rabbit" or "Two Heads" from the "Baxter's" album. Listen to the way she pronounces man in the line, "You need a man." It's low and husky — something like a female Louis Armstrong. If that's not enough, the "seven inches of pleasure" part, or the post-orgasmic rendering of the word measured is enough to send all male listners into convulsions. This cut alone is worth the price of the whole album. Grace's two other compositions "Fishman" and "Fat" are less striking, but nontheless fine songs.

Of the rest of the cuts, "Ballad of the Chrome Nun" and "Harp Tree Lament" stand out. "Ballad" serves much the same function as did "Ballad of You, Me, and Pooneil" on that masterpiece 'After Bathing of Baxter's": introducing the "Airplane's" particular/peculiar brand of music. Instead of reverberating feedback, Grace's piano provides this introduction this time. "Harp Tree Lament," with lyrics by Grateful Dead associate Pobert Hunter, is a fine display of David Freiberb's quivery vocal.

This album could be the best of the Airplane-related projects. It's certainly better than "Sunfighter" and at least runs a close second to "Blows Against the Empire." Strangely enough, the record isn't very popular. I don't even think it broke into Billboard's Top 200. The Airplane has been getting bad press recently, especially since the abortive "Long John Silver" release. Maybe Grace's forth-coming solo album, which should be one of the more bizarre enterprises of rock music history, will bring the these musicians the attention they deserve.

In a previous column, I asserted that the yearbook serves a definite function to the college community. After the distribution of the past year's yearbooks, I am beginning to question my original assertion.

This column, in that previous article, stated that in the past "the yearbook has not exactly been a journalistic masterpiece." After seeing the new yearbook, one can correctly assume it to be a "picture-book," rather than a journalistic work. There are no stories in the book; hence, one will not be able to use the book in future years to know what happened last year at Juniata.

Furthermore, there isn't one caption in the entire book! It's just an assortment of pictures that show what a few Juniata students looked like during 1973. Moreover, many of the pictures are from past yearbooks. They give a nice air of nostalgia to the "picturebook," but one could get the same effect by visiting either the Lesher or South Lounges and looking at vast collections of old yearbooks there.

Underclassmen now wonder why they were called for pictures during finals last spring. Perhaps last year's editors are now making a collage in their room with our faces. Even the great institution of Juniata, All-Class night, was ignored in this year's book. Students were also deprived of getting to see old pictures of faculty members when they had short hair—a unique treat of past yearbooks.

Who can you complain to about this book? Nobody. Last year's editor, Mary Ann Repman departed the solemn Juniata campus at graduation last June. Perhaps we should make the yearbook editor be a "junior class" student, so he and his staff can be held accountable for their production.

The only alternative that the students have this year is to help Steve Wentz and his staff make sure the yearbook is a worthwhile endeavor from early indications. It appears that Wentz has a well-organized staff and the yearbook is progressing steadily already this year. It is our responsibility to make sure that the $9000 spent for the yearbook will be warranted in the future. It is painfully evident that it was not warranted last year.

Camolet Brings Chivalrous Days Back With Music

by Stella

There are perhaps 110 legends which are as exciting or as imaginative as those of King Arthur and his Knights of the Round Table. Literally, hundreds of books have been written on this subject—works ranging in diversity from Alfred, Lord Tennyson's beautiful poem "Idylls of the King" to the medieval classic "Sir Gawain and the Green Knight." There is even a new book out now whose author has tried to discover where and what Camelot, King Arthur's Kingdom, really was. But no book is as well loved or as often read as T. H. White's absolutely fabulous "The Once and Future King." And it is this book upon which Alan J. Lerner and Frederick Loewe based their beautiful play "Camelot."

Directed by Joshua Logan, "Camelot" became one of the hit movie musicals of the past decade. Richard Harris, one of the finest actor-singers in the world, gives a magnificent performance as King Arthur, lovely Vanessa Redgrave plays Guinevere and Franco Nero is Lancelot. The essence of the characters is captured in the songs which they sing such as "If Ever I Would Leave You" and "How to Handle a Woman." Many of the featured plots and characters of the 800-page book were deleted in order to concentrate on the love story of Guinevere and Lancelot, but there is still variety in the songs and sub-plots. Best of all, the movie is yet another means of keeping alive that chivalrous all-too- short time when "for one brief, shining moment" there was Camelot.

This film will be shown on December 14, at 8:00 in Oller Hall. Admission price will be $.75.

A scene from "Camelot", to be shown Friday at 8:00 in Oller.

Merry Christmas

Again, why are you so inconsiderate?

Let me now turn my attention, and griping, to those who provide us with all those barren paths across green, grassy areas. Why is it so difficult for you to take a few extra steps and moments to get where you are going? You see, I enjoy nature at her finest. I like grassy areas, trees, flowers, etc. Why must you make a short-cuts through such areas? What is there about you that is so important that only you count? I thought we had reached a compromise on this years ago. . . , we had agreed to sidewalks and asphalt paths to solve the problem! Do we have to come to another decision on such a basic consideration?

Am I through? Not yet. Read on, I may get to your peeve also. I have another "burr under my saddle."

I am concerned with the general lack of enthusiasm that exists for so much of what is offered here at Juniata. Why are you here if the greatest thrill of the week is to get away? Why did you choose Juniata and Huntingdon if you find it unbearable not only to exist here but, also, to contribute to the environment? What is there about the programs (art, political, social, sports, etc.) at Juniata that bring on waves of apathy and even resentment? What can be; must be done to make life here more than a brief encounter with a bit of knowledge in a classroom or a laboratory? Has it become completely old-hat to show some gut-feelings about what is going on around us? Any feeling would be preferable to "so what?".

I could continue to get more "off my chest" but why get everyone mad at me at once? I could ask questions of those who litter; those who are generally inconsiderate of others; those who pollute the air with harsh sounds but I'll wait. However, just in case you have assumed, by now, that this is just a member of the older generation taking a paternal swing at the younger generation, may I say that your wrong. I am asking these questions of all ages; all people; including me.

If you have bothered to read this far, thank you.

Africa — Safari ?

by Richard A. Frempong

I have been prompted to write this article because I am appalled by the gross ignorance of some college students in "the most advanced society". It's true that people in different countries like to stereotype other people in other countries, but the degree of stereotyping Africans is too high here to be ignored. I consider this attitude an atrocity against Mother Africa and in order to help correct this misconception I will endeavour to present the Africa I know accurately to you in a series of articles. Most of the information you have on Africa is probably false and biased. To understand my point, read through the following questions.

"Do you have coke in Africa?"

"What do you do to the monkeys in Africa?"

"Have you ridden an elephant before?"

"You come from Ghana, Oh! Do you see crocodiles often. . .I mean are they dangerous?"

"Seen an escolator before, Rich?"

"Do you have tea and coffee in Ghana?"

The list could go on and on but I hope this would suffice for the present. Often I have had to try hard to keep from giving rude replies to such silly questions. What's more annoying is the fact that this attitude is not confined to Juniata campus alone. I have had he impression that this idea of stereotyped African is held by a greater majority of Americans.

What people don't realise is the fact that the winds of the Industrial Revolution that blew over Europe and ushered in this modern civilisation did not confine itself to Europe and America alone but affected all continents. Africa is not U.S.A. for sure, but it's definitely not a zoo either.

Surely we have animals in Africa but they are not "all over the place" as you are made to believe. The only live bear, tiger, elephant, chimpanzee or hippopotamus that I have seen were at the zoo.

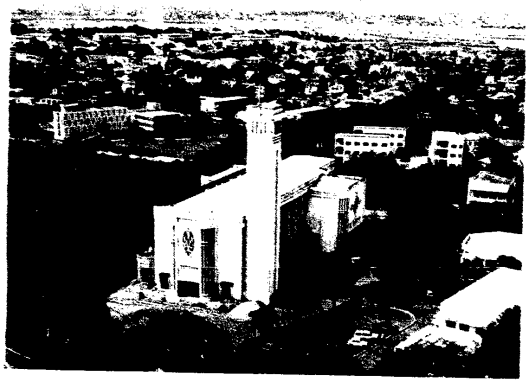
Maybe it's all due to the type of movies (Wild Kingdom) shown here on TV. What your media fails to tell you is the fact that they took those pictures at State reserved parks especially developed for tourist attraction. In Ghana I never saw a live deer except at the zoo but here at Huntingdon I have seen a couple of deer run across the campus in broad daylight. Does that mean that in the U.S.A. you have deer running "all over the place?"

You are being deceived, brainwashed, fooled. If you ever happened to go to Africa you would be very disappointed. You would be disappointed because, like most visitors to Africa, you would consider your trip to Africa as a superadventure. You would think you are Scipio Africanus or Mungo Park or maybe David Livingston about to discover the Dark Continent—full of snakes and other reptiles and lions and elephants and monkeys.

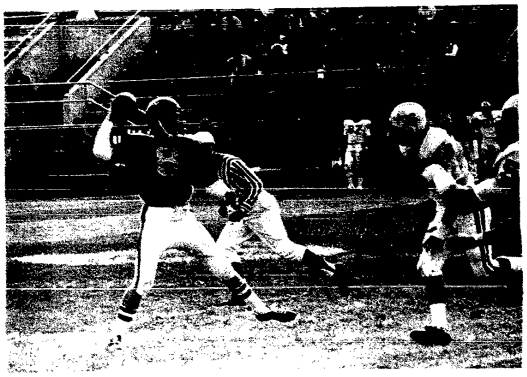
However, your plane would land and, much to your chagrin, instead of huge reptiles and elephants, you would be confronted by huge concrete and glass buildings; you might as well have been back in New York city except that the Black population would have increased drastically. Your suitcase won't be carried by an elephant. No, it would ride to meet you at the luggage room on an elevator, and you would be ushered into a spacious lounge alive with nice hospitable people; people with a past, a tradition, a culture. You would sit down at the lounge bar to have a glass of beer (don't be alarmed, for here there are no age restrictions so you don't have to hide it when you drink) with all sorts of people — black and white, all equal. Also, there would be beautiful black girls with sparkling eyes and dazzling-white teeth, but don't stare so much, you may spill your drink. See the smile on their lips? It's all saying 'Akwaaba' (welcome) to you.

Unfortunately, your elephant won't be around to carry you home so we would get you a taxi to any hotel of your choice. If you don't know which to choose, simply relax and trust it to the taxi driver. There are a whole lot of hotels (Ambassador, Continental, Meridian etc.) to choose from and he would make sure you get one that suits your taste. The bill? Don't worry! For a double room in a hotel of the standard of Sheraton hotels you only pay $12 per night. You get all the modern conveniences obtainable at a modern hotel anywhere, plus the traditional hospitality at no extra cost. Remember we are friendly not because we want your money. We just want to know you and to make you feel happy and at home.

There is so much to be seen (the night life, for example) but you look so tired so just relax. Later you may go to the fantastic restaurant and have dinner — local and European foods are served. Tomorrow is another day and we shall begin to explore the city of Accra — the museums, Art Centre, Zoo, markets and shops and the beaches. Don't be anxious of the weather, we have summer all year long. From Accra we shall take a bus or train inland to see the countryside. We shall visit cities, towns and villages. Also we shall tour the holiday resorts and the Game parks and take a boat ride on the Volta lake—the largest man-made lake on earth. Da Yie oooh! (Sound Sleep)



Football Team Ends Miracle Season



by Jeff Porterfield

Gary Shope fights against the tough Wittenberg defense, as he prepares to pass.

By Tony Martuzas

Perhaps the best way to sum up last Saturday's NCAA Divsion III Championship, would be a UPI (United Press International) printout, which is presently hanging on the bulletin board in Juniata's campus radio station: "Juniata College was overpowered by Wittenberg University 41-0 giving Wittenberg the Championship in NCAA, Division III. Juniata was plagued with turnovers and penalties on key plays. They could muster only 89 yards on the ground . . . but gathered 134 yards via the airlanes".

Wittenberg is not just any "ordinary" team out of the 194 schools which could have received bids for the Amos Alonzo Stagg Bowl in Phenix City, Alabama. The Tigers of Wittenberg can boast of 19 consecutive winning seasons, four national championships, 11 Ohio Conference titles, seven perfect seasons (three in the last five), produced 13 All-American football players in the last 10 seasons, and other amazing feats described in the Second Annual Stagg Bowl Program.

Coach Nadzak knew that only a "perfect" game could have made the contest close. But due to many mistakes, the game couldn't even be considered a "good" one. I for one, could not care less.

Earlier this year, I was confused how such a team which trampled such giant schools as Gettysburg and Ithica, let alone last year's MAC's North Division Champs (Albright College by a score of 17-0), was not played up (i.e., having huge headlines in the campus newspaper). After watching our football team take on a "fired-up" Wilkes team in front of a non-existing "hometown crowd" (i.e., the type that makes noise, in addition to touchdowns), I knew something had to be done.

I personally thank all the people (mostly freshmen) who exhibited faith in their school by showing up at the Moravian football game and made a lot of noise, despite the freezing weather. Again, personal thanks to frosh Senators Dave McCarren and Ed Hinchey for mustering up some kind of "pep band", also to the many other people like frosh Jan Snyder who instructed her roommate Robin Bepler how to play some basics on the snare drum and to Bev Martin, who despite being able to travel free to Alabama as a pep band member, willingly paid the full price and was there with the band. I hope students will take the initiative to keep this sort of thing continuing; hopefully it has been demonstrated that such an activity can be done. And just don't do this for winners. A lot of noise from a crowd can add to an athletes performance. I believe this is due to something called "adrenaline".

To me, the greatest part of last Saturday's Championship match was the whole-hearted chorus of "We're proud of our team", despite being on the losing end of the score. These fans just didn't get up and leave with a few minutes remaining, which was the case in an earlier clash between Juniata and Wilkes. These people stayed until the final second. There was nothing phoney about that cheer; it was a salute. Everybody apreciated how hard those 22 players fought unrelentlessly in that game. True the players bowwed their heads and felt dejected, as all good players do when defeated. Their efforts were not just a total waste. They have only done their best. The fans could ask for nothing more.

Earlier this year, I made two pregame predictions to myself; 1. Juniata will lose to Wilkes 2. Juniata will lose to Bridgeport. During the Wilkes game, I knew their fan support would aid the Colonels to their upset. Before the Bridgeport semi-final Championshfp game, I knew the players must have been physical wrecks. After ten games, mangled bodies and twisted limbs fail to perform as effective as they onee have during the early stages of the season when muscles were solid and fresh. No way was Juniata going to beat Bridgeport. I'm so glad I was wrong.

As far as I'm concerned, I'm surprized this team didn't lose 127-0. The score is irrelevent and not a reflection of the game. What more could you ask of a team was 3-4-2 in 1971, 6-3 in 1972, and 10-2 in 1973. You know as well as I do, they want to go back to Phenix City and become the best small college in the nation.

So this has been the greatest football team in Juniata's history. As Coach Nadzak solemly confessed at the game's conclusion, "We just ran out of miracles". This team will be back next year, and they'll make even more miracles.

by Jeff Porterfield

The offense gets a good workout in last Saturday's game.

Women's Basketball Starts Season

This year's women's basketball team has been practicing hard since November 1, for their opener against Messiah College. This game will be played at home on January 19, with the following game at Gettysburg.

The girls have a new coach this year who has been described as "tough". Mr. Frazier has been drilling the players in man-to-man and zone offenses, as well as a man-to-man defense.

Those players who have shown the greatest potential are Verne Wetzel, Sue Rosshirt, Kim Norris, Mardi Frye and Kathy Dicky.

Those showing the greatest improvement in practices are: Jackie Prentiss, Elaine Becker, Leslie Whittaker, Lynne Appel, Cherrie Dettmar, Laila Eways, Sue Kaminskas, Barb Kosik, Lynne Nenstiell and Ellen Valentine.

Sports Stumpin'

The football season has finally run its course and much congratulations should be given to the Indian squad. This team is surely one of the finest ever here at Juniata. However besides the winning season another feature of the football team was the spirit generated for the team. Many people followed the team to Bridgeport and Alabama and really for the first time in the three years I've been here showed they cared. It was nice. Even those people who for some reason didn't go to the game showed they were with the team if only in spirit. It certainly was different to say the least. It was especially nice to see people talking together about our chances or being on TV and it was especially nice to go home at Thanksgiving and have people recognize Juniata as being a small college and not some disease.

The national exposure brought to Juniata through the football, can only serve to help the school and once again congratulations to the team.

Football is over and we must remember that we do have other sports. Why can't this new found spirit carry over. Maybe it will only time will tell but let's give it a try. The basketball and wrestling teams are not going to be contenders for national honors, yet anyway. But remember the football team had some bad seasons also. Hopefully the teams will get things together and make improvements over the past years. However we might be able to help a bit. I'm sure the basketball players, both men and women, and wrestlers might try a little harder if their friends and classmates were there to see them. Put yourself in their position! So on behalf of all atheles, take a little time over to the gym and scream a little, yell at the refs do anything but show those who are giving their time for the school that you care, at least a little. It sure can't hurt!

B-ball Team Has It All Together

By Gary Gillen

The Indian basketball squad made it two in a row at home as they played an impressive game in beating a good Pitt at Johnstown team 79-62. (UPJ had previously beaten Slippery Rock 87-78) Juniata was again led by junior Mike (Evil) Kenealy and soph. Donny Williams who had 23 and 22 points repectively. Soph. transfer Bill Bickel added 17 big points as the Indians put it all together for the win.

With Oscar Hachett quarterbacking the offense Juniata played its' deliberate offense and moved the ball well against the Panthers of UPJ. Big Tim Tabor and Donny Martin provided the muscle under the boards and Juniata was able to gain a 5 point lead by half. Many disbelieving fans were wondering if Juniata had finally put it all together. When the 2nd half began the Indians proved to the Panthers and everyone else that they were for real as they rolled on to a big win. Robbie Carles added 7 and Martin and Tabor rounded out the scoring with 4 and 2 points.

The Indians with the win Monday evened their record at 2-2 having come off a tough loss to Lycoming at Lycoming. Juniata will now take to the road with a game Thursday at York. The Indians then head out to Alliance Ohio to play in a holiday tournament. Juniata will meet Hiram in the 1st game then hopefully face the winner of the Mt. Union Rochester Tech game for the championship. The games will be played the 20th and 21st of December. For those of you who live out in the West your support of the team would greatly be appreciated.

Happenings On Campus

Task Force

I am sure that there are many students interested in the cirriculum here at Juniata. Like most, they probably feel that there is both good and bod in just about every aspect of the cirriculum. Student Government is now in the process of instituting a task force to study this phase of JC life. The task force will question the value of Modes, HEHs, HEAs, the Writing Program, and the Freshman Seminar. They will present their findings to the faculty in the form of a report.

In recent months in this paper, there has been a great deal of questioning of the cirriculum, and just how important it is. With this term, the final requirement of the program, HEA, has been unveiled to us. After three years of questions, the program is complete. Student Government now feels that an evaluation is in order, and that the evaluation will help to plan changes for years ahead, and changes to be instituted right away so that we can get the best possible use of our money.

For anyone interested in working on the task force, the best thing to do would be to leave your name at the student Government office during the meal hours.

This should be a valuable project, and should help plan for "Juniata's Future."

Art on Display

Fabric colleges, silk screens prints and mobiles by Janet Lindsay of State College are on display in the Shoemaker Galleries at Juniata College.

Mrs. Lindsay is an art teacher in the State College area schools and holds the master of education degree in art from Pennsylvania State University. She also has studied at Miami University of Ohio and the University of California where she received the bachelor of fine arts degree.

Her works in fabric have been shown for the past three years in juried craft shows of the Central Pennsylvania Festival of the Arts and other exhibits sponsored by the Art Alliance of Central Pennsylvania. In addition, she participated last spring in the Blair County Arts Festival at Altoona.

She uses the techniques of applique, batik, stitchery and macrame to add dimension and versatility to her work. Moreover, she does watercolors.

Before she moved to State College six years ago, Mrs. Lindsay taught art in junior and senior high schools in the suburban Chicago area. She presently teaches adult evening classes in batik and silk screen printing as well as two high school art classes.

Her work will remain on display at Juniata through January 31.

Students Race to Blue Knob for Skiing Delights

by Janet Millburn

As the temperatures fall and the snows come, Juniatians once again head for Blue Knob and the Intramural Skiing Program. The program lasts for four consecutive Monday nights beginning on January 7 and continuing until January 28. The trips leave around 5:20 and return around 11:15.

Blue Knob is located near Altoona, about an hour's ride from Juniata. There were several connecting slopes lit, to make one long run to the bottom, with the main chairlift in operation. Lights put on other slopes to add more possibilities and variety would be a welcome addition and are included in the plans of possible future development. The lodge, being located at the top of the slopes rather than at the bottom, as is more conventional, provides the skier with the bite of colder, less buffered winds than if the lodge location was, lower, but the lodge location is planned to be moved lower in the future.

Each skier participating in the intramural program buys a lift ticket and an hour lesson each time. He is also offered the option of renting equipment for about $8.00, which includes the total rental. There is also bus transportation if needed by the participant.

The first trip was quite a success, although colder than most had expected. The bus was filled with the usual ski talk, foam boots versus conventional, how to choose ski lengths, snow-plow, parallel, stemming and the envitable question, "How long have you been skiing?"

Once at Blue Knob, the students succumbed to the tangled mass of standing in lines waiting for lift tickets and the confusion of deciding if they were beginner of intermediate skiers.

The lessons progressed for an hour, after the intermediate class had undergone the tortures of skiing down the hill in front of everyone to determine their skill. At the end of the lessons, everyone was turned loose on the slopes until 10:00 when the lifts were closed.

This certainly is one replacement for the now-gone Monday night football.

Disillusioned Juniatian Express His Opinion Of New "Curriculum"

by Dave Baer

In the light of Academic developments on campus in the last few years, I might be persuaded to believe that the following conversation did occur.

Let's go back several years and listen to a conversation between two of the faculty that takes place in one of the shadier corners of Founders.

"Hey Henry, did you read the article in yesterdays paper 'bout the future of small colleges?"

"Naw. Whadit say, Sam?"

"It said that unless the small colleges start an' offer new an' interesting programs that there could be a lota professors outta jobs."

"Yeah."

"An it went on to say that students were going to be interested in a completely different style of education."

"Like What?"

"Aw, it gave some kinda hairbrained idea that said colleges oughta give students the right to make their own decisions an' how students should have more responsibilities an' that a student should learn to be an autonomous individual an' all sorts of other crazy notions."

"I did huh."

"Yeah, an it went on to say that colleges that don't do all of this crap might have hard times as soon as the mid 70s.'"

"Sounds pretty bad."

"AW, I doubt if there's anything in it."

"I don't know, Sam, it might not be such a bad idea."

"What! You mean do all that stuff? Christ, they'll over run us!"

"Naw, not really do it. I mean jes' make students think that they have all those rights an' responsibilities an' whatever that was about atonomy."

"Henry, jes' what in the hell for?"

"I jes' got tenure at this place an' I could put up with a good bit of bullshit to hang on to my position here."

"Sam, I can see your point. Les' bring it up at the next faculty meeting."

I don't know that the original intention of the Task Force on Curriculum that started in 1969 on its project of academic revision wasn't a sales pitch for Juniata. However, after several years of watching its implementation, one certainly could question the matter. This is the first of a series of several articles expressing my opinion of the New Curriculum.

JC Presents Philharmonic

The Warsaw Philharmonic, officially designated as the national orchestra of Poland, is appearing in concert for the 1973-74 Artist Series at Juniata on Monday, January 21 at 8 p.m. in Oller Auditorium.

Conducted by Zygmund Rychert and featuring violin soloist Kanstanty Kula,the 100-piece orchestra has toured Europe, Asia, Africa, and Australia as well as the United States. Its press-releases claim that no other orchestra in the world has given as many foreign concerts over the past 15 years.

For its Juniata appearance the orchestra will be preforming Symphony No. 94 in G major (the "Surprise Symphony") by Joseph Haydn, the Concerto for Violin and Orchestra No. 1 in D major, Opus 19, by Sergey Prokofiev, Psychodrama by Vadeusz Baird and the Suite from the ballet Petrushka by Igor Stravinsky.

Future programs in the Artist Series will be presented by pantomime Zwi Kanor on March 12, the University of Illinois Zazz Ensemble on March 17, and multi-media specialists Chick and Ann Herbert on April 22. Tickets are priced at $5 for individual programs in the Series.

Students can obtain free passes at the information desk.

Special Course Offerings To Be Given Spring Term

The following courses will be offered in the third (spring) term, but are not listed in the course offering phamphlets or described in the catalogue. Anyone interested in having any other special topics listed in the newspaper should contact the Juniatian, via Box 667.

Prison Systems—

Starting with a socio-political analysis of the problems through a comparative perspective, several theories of social change will be considered in Greg Geibel's new Course entitled "Social Change and Organization Conflict". The prison as an example of an archac and problematic social institution, will be analyzed from an historical and organizational perspective. Following this, an evaluation will be made of Saul Alinsky's theories of social change applicd to the prison organization. The prerequisite for the course is "Sociology of Deviance" or permission of the instructor.

Chaplin—

Professor Clayton Briggs announces that the Department of Speech and Theatre will introduce a Special Topics course on the life, art and legacy of Charlie Chaplin in the third term. The course is entitled CHARLIE CHAPLIN, the "nickel comedian". In preparation of the course offering, forty-one super 8mm prints of his comedies have been ordered through NEH funding. The films will cover his early work for Mack Sennett (the Keystone period) and progress through the Essamay and Mutual periods. The earliest print will be Making a Living which was released by Keystone on February 2, 1914. The Adventurer, released October 23, 1917 under the Mutual banner, represents the final Chaplin film in the series acquired by the Beegley Library. The Tramp, Easy Street and The Pawnshop are included in the series.

To broaden the perspective on the comic genius of Charlie Chaplin, Professor Briggs will include discussions on the contribution of the Italian comedians—the Comedia del' arte. Through an examination of the myriad of ways in which a comic artist can make man laugh at himself—with detailed study of Charlie Chaplin's works—the participating student should walk away not only with a sharpened awareness of the truth about himself, but with an unmistakable ingratiating smile on his face. Charlie Chaplin, the "nickel comedian" is a one unit offering open to all Juniata students. There is no prerequite required for registration.

Computer Center Reorganized And Headed By Student

Doctor Irene M. Engle, assistant professor of physics, has announced that the Academic Computing Center has increased it accessibility this year with a greater number of operating hours and with a student serving as director of operations.

Myron Zimmerman, the student director, will have office hours from 1 to 4 p.m. in the Computer Center, P-107 of the Brumbaugh Science Center. His main functions will include systems maintenance and scheduling, as well as a programing consultant to students and faculty.

There will also be ten other students available for programming assistance. They are: Richard Bennett, Bruce Bordner, Rodger Devonald, Cynthia Gilbert, Thomas Heffner, Dale Hoover, Carol McFate, Matthew Musho, James Reiley, and Emenike Ukazim.

Dear Fellow Students,

Thursday evening, January 3, NBC televised a documentary entitled THE COLLEGE MONEY CRUNCH. Those of us who watched the program, besides being delighted (pleasantly surprised?) to see the name, Juniata College, right in there beside Yale, were informed of the financial difficulties private colleges are currently facing and the primary causes and effects of the problem. At present, Juniata isn't "crunched"—but indeed we are feeling a pinch. According to the admissions statistics we're doing better than any other college in Central Pa.—for how long? Adequate enrollment is the key that keeps the doors open, and admissions are down and dropping nationwide.

I, personally, sympathized with the people NBC interviewed from Belknap College in New England; they felt that the particular combination of philosophy, curriculum, and personnel of Belknap College added up to more than just higher educational training. To them, Belknap College had something special that they didn't see in most other schools, and they valued it so much that they couldn't let it die easily—the college was reopened at student request not long after it had officially foided. I think many of us recognize a similar special something at Juniata; generally, it's what we bitch about as freshman and for the most part come to value as juniors. I don't believe we have to worry about salvaging it; I, myself, can't imagine Juniata College folding. But I see much reason for us to be concerned about preserving the fuality of our relatively unique educational product (after all, that's our selling point).

Most of the good fortune we've seen thus far can be attributed to this reputation Juniata has developed and maintained, and to a conscientious focus on the future; (according to NBC, the latter is an advantage that Belknap appears to have lacked). The Council of Deans is largely responsible for our short range planning and the recently organized Commission to Plan for Juniata's Future is looking further ahead. But administration does not and, I suspect, probably could not pull the weight alone. A critical percentage of the Juniata student body is here not as a response to a planned admissions program, but rather as a result of an informal, personal association with a student or former student of Juniata.

So far, this nonprogrammed recruiting has been very casual with little intentional effort on the part of the informal student recruiters. However, it appears that if Juniata is to make it over this upcoming hurdle without compromising academic form, we students will have to do more than what has been our naturally casual part in order to help counterbalance the trend of declining admissions. The administration can't count on our doing more to help—even if they asked us pretty please. All they can do is hope—hope that some of that value centered (com)mode has actually broken a little ice and that enough of us decide that what Juniata offers is worth the taking of some responsibility to it.

If we decide it is worth it, what can we do? The fact s that it's not hard at all to help because Juniata sells itself; all it needs is our mouths and our hands to spread the name and what it means. We should all know the fundamentals, afterall, we each write a Program of Emphasis and anxiously await

This college, at least to me, is not exactly the most intellectually stimulating environment outside of the classroom. I am sure that I could count on my fingers the number of times that I have discussed the book I just finished, or the on-campus movie outside of class. There are all too many people that when the books are closed for the weekend, get in the rut of either running home or getting high. I must admit, I also find myself in this rut, and I even look foreward to it.

In the past few weeks, Center Board has been kicking around the idea of a free school. This would consist of no-credit courses for a small cost (to cover the expenses of the course). Courses like Cross Country Skiing, Auto Mechanics, Harmonica, Body Massage, and Natural Foods have been tried with great success at other schools. Anyone in the school with knowledge they would like to share would be able to teach a course, and all courses would be open to any member of the campus community.

To me, this seems a start for learning experiences outside the general format. But, there is a problem. Center Board, of which I am a member, has stratified itself in such a way as to designate certain responsibilities to certain people. This leaves no one to assume responsibility for different programs out of the realm of music, films, and special events (Homecoming, etc.). What we need is a backlog of students interested in working on different projects to initiate programs of this sort.

The mere fact that this type of program has bten discussed, is a start, but what we really need are ideas and help.

Africa-Safari ?

by Agyei Frempong

We were supposed to tour Accra, capital of the Republic of Ghana, but wouldn't you agree with me that there is enough time and we need not worry? Since we are here (in Africa) we might as well get the best out of it and for that matter wouldn't you agree with me also that some basic information on Africa would be more than desirable? I should point it out at this stage, that Africa is a large continent, second only to Asia in total land area, and it would be preposterous for me to delegate to myself the authority to speak for the whole continent. Therefore for the purpose of this article, and successive ones, I will limit myself to Ghana refering to other parts of Africa, where petinent, and only when I have accurate information.

Which nations constitute present day Africa? Who runs these states and what types of governments are there.

There are some 41 independent African states today. However, there are certain areas which are still under colonial rule. These areas are Guinea Bissau (Portuguese Guinea), Namibia, South West Africa, South Africa, Mozambique and Rhodesia.

In the areas controlled by Portugal there are nationalist liberation movements fighting for independence. A good example is Portuguese Guinea where the liberation movement controls about two-thirds of the country.

In South Africa and in Rhodesia a few white settlers from Europe, by advantage of their superior arms and also encouraged and assisted by the imperialist nations i.e. Britian & Co., have subjected the native Africans under their white supremist rule. This government they audaciously call 'Apparthied'; a doctrine that seperates the people into races and holds whites superior to all other races of people.

The segregationist policy here is so extreme that whites and coloureds (all other races) live and work differently and apart from each other. There are 'white' streets, settlement areas, bars, busses, etc, etc. Coloureds are prohibited from entering areas reserved for whites, and need a pass to go from their resident areas to other parts of the country. It is also considered a crime for a white to tutor a black. For doing the same work, whites recieve almost five times as much as blacks do.

One may wonder how this situation developed. Well, it all started with sea voyages from Europe to India. The ships from Europe had to sail all the way down the West African coast and around South Africa to get to India, because the Suez Canal had not yet been constructed. They therefore thought it convenient to settle some whites on the South African Coast to produce farm products to resupply the ships on their voyages to and from India. The whites soon took advantage of the favorable climatic and vegetational conditions and having the "all-powerful gun" drove the natives off their lands, and seized them for themselves after a series of confrotations in which the natives lost at the end.

Why does this situation continue to persist? Apparthied persists owing to two main reasons: economic and social factors. The area produces more gold than any other nation on earth and also has large diamond and other mineral deposits. The other factor is that European nations are afraid that when the Africans take over they might drive out the whites and thereby force Europe to take them back (as it happened in Uganda). They therefore give the segregationist regime every moral, economic and material support, though, at the UN, they publicly disclaim it. What they fail to see is that by prolonging the situation they are creating conditions for their 'fears (to come) aright', when the Africans take over (which they will eventually do).

However, as I mentioned before, the rest of Africa is independent. These states are the Soveriegn Republics of Mauritania and Mauritius to the North West; Senegal, Mali, Guinea, Sierra Leone, Ivory Coast, Upper Volta, Niger, Ghana, Togo, Dahomey, Nigeria, Chad, Cameroon, Equtorial Guinea, Liberia, Gambia, and Gabon to the West Coast. On the North are the states of Morocco, Algeria, Tunisia, Libya and Egypt. To the North East are Ethiopia and the Somali Republic and on the East Coast are the nations of Kenya, Uganda, Tanzania, Zambia, Bostwana, Rwanda, Burundi, Lesotho, Malawi and Swaziland. In the centre are the Central African Republic, The Peoples Republic of Congo and Zaire and finally the island of the Malagassy Republic off the East Coast.

Ever since independence these nations are all run by native Africans.

What types of governments can be found in these nations?

A friend remarked to me in conversation sometime ago, "But they say most of the African nations are Communist?" It is not true. That is just the interpretation given by outsiders who do not see the situation clearly, or are confused by it.

Several factors go into giving African governments their present characteristics and I would attempt to mention a few important ones here. The literacy rate in African nations is very low at the moment. This is due to the poor performance by the Colonial countries in educating the masses of their colonies, despite the fact that most of these nations have been colonized for over a hundred years. The situation is further complicated by the fact that these modern African nations are made up of several tribes, with different beliefs, customs and languages (there are over 800 languages in Africa) some of whose idea of national unity are not yet firm enough. Often some people have prefered to pay loyalty and allegiance to tribe and tribal chief rather to the state and government.

When Dr. Nkrumah led Ghana into independence he had to break up the power of the tribal chiefs as well as the opposing political parties who were advocating for a loose federation. He finally managed to preserve Ghana's unity but at the cost of oen man dictatorship and one party state. Fifteen years after independence Ghana is now a firmly united country and ther is no longer a one party state. Other Suspenseful and Shocking, "Rosemary's Baby Arrives"

by Stella

If you've read the book of "Rosemary's Baby," there won't be any surprises for you in the movie—except, perhaps, that it's much better than most "suspense" type films. The material is very well handled and the final product is really fine entertainment.

"Rosemary's Baby" is directed by Roman Polanski, who is noted for his striking and provocative films. And this one is no exception. The story is told in a straight-forward manner—letting us stay always one step ahead of Rosemary. But it's not boring even when you know what's going to happen next.

I don't consider Mia Farrow a great actress but she is perfect as Rosemary. Her waifish image is exactly what was needed to convey the helplessness of the young wife in a situation over which she has no control. John Cassavetes, whom I admire greatly both as an actor and as a director, is very well-cast as Rosemary's husband. Maurice Evans, Sidney Blackiner and Ralph Bellamy are all excellent actors and they handle their parts beautifully. I can't stand Ruth Gordon which is fine because I'm not too crazy about the character she plays, either and it just makes her role more plausible—at least, for me.

If you're looking for deep, psychological meanings I suppose you could find them in "Rosemary's Baby" but that's not why it's an excellent movie. It's great because it combines all the elements of good film-making and the end result is a movie that is a little bit funny and a little bit scary, rarely, if ever, boring and certainly worth seeing. It will be shown in Oller Hall on Friday, January 18, at 8:00 p.m. Admission will be $.75.

Late Fall

Tree, i have watched you outside my window over two months now.
i saw you turn,
blush with color, then drop your leaves to the ground as delicate dancers
in tune with the wind.

As you stand now so naked the ballet over and stripped of all color
i wonder sadly if the time will ever pass
until you are full again until i can once more see the beauty of you beneath the September sun.

From the Inside

You rock, rock, rock,
Rock your life away,
Where's your knitting needles and yarn,
You'll click those needles to the best of laughter, you,
Mad bitch.

I'll come and spit on your grave
when you're buried,
That's right, laugh,
I'll help tip your wine bottle high.

Love, I would give these sweet fruits
Before they grow old
If they were yet mine

But for old not too many
And for me not too mine

Can the earth now forgive me
That I've lost what I had

These fruits are not mine
But those of my Lord

Love I would catch these flowers
Before they go by
If they were still mine

But for lost I am saddened
And for home I have not

I have now no time
But that of my Lord

Yes. the earth seems so plenty
Sometimes so good
But seems so not mine
For the good I've not any
And that is no good
So the name that I have still
I'll give to my Lord.

We all noticed it in passing as we walked by,
But it had no use for us as it was.
We watched the children one to five
As they ran and fought and played with the dogs.
"It's a shame the children don't know they're still free"
Was one remark, an expected comment to be made.
After a while it happened,
Happened that the child,
A child of perhaps four,
Noticed and didn't pass.
It wasn't connected, but Since he was four, that meant nothing,
He stopped and used it and as we tried to look and look away,
We all started laughing and blessing the child inside
For allowing us to see this freedom more clearly.
Most of all when he went with the words,
"Hey Dad, I found a toilet and I peed in it",
Proud that he had discovered and used it himself,
I remembered a part of a past self.

Plain white lady in a plain white dress,
She is a dancer,
A dancer, yes.
One night barefoot before the crowd
The music was rythmic,
Fast and loud.

Her mother had taught her
Yes ma'am, no sir,
Spoken in a voice one had to lean toward to hear.
But that night she swung her hips as well
As anyone. All that watched could tell
It was her.

Pale white lady in a crimson dress,
She is now a dancer,
A dancer, yes.
One night the eyes of all the men
Were on her. My lady,
Dance again.

I Feel Just Like Cry'n
A blues lyric

Lost all my money,
Dealin' down & out stud.
My woman just left me,
Wouldn't stay if she could.
Head feels like its spinnin',
From that half-dollar wine.
Ain't never been winnin',
But now, I feel just like cry'n.

Friends they all tell me,
"You won't come to no good."
Always too drunk to see,
Can't go do like I should.
Some day gonna lay me,
In a box of old pine.
Be first time I was free.
But now, I feel just like cry'n.

Won't be nuthin' left,
That'll show when I'm gone.
Gonna be for the best,
After all that I done.
If you stand by my grave,
There sure won't be no line.
Be first time I was brave,
But now, I feel just like cry'n.

Hoopmen Trip Up Upsala; Achieve 2-2 MAC Record

by Bruce Borelner

Indians jump against Gettysburg in game held January 8 on the home court.

by Gary Gillen

The Indians playing one of their best games evened their record at 5-5 with a 99-85 victory over Upsala here Saturday night. With Donny Williams and Mike Kenealy again leading the way, the Indians put on what had to be their most impressive offensive showing of the year. With starters Tim Tabor and Oscar Hachett getting into foul trouble, Mark Jula and Don Martin came off the bench to guide JC to the victory. Mark Jula, who took over the quarterbacking job for Oscar Hachett for the entire second half, guided the team beautifully in what may have been his finest game here at Juniata.

For those of you who may not have been able to follow the Indians while we were on break, the Indians played in the Holiday Tournament in Ohio. Juniata finished third, losing, the first game, then coming back to win the consolation game in overtime. Another casulty of the break was the loss of sophomore guard Robbie Carles, who withdrew from school.

After the return to campus, Juniata suffered its first home defeat, losing to a very good Gettysburg team. So with the victory Saturday night, JC is back at 500 and has carried a 500, 2-2 record in the fight for MAC honors.

The team has run hot and cold all year, at times playing very well then turning around and playing rather poorly. If Juniata is able to put it all together for the remainder of the season, as it has shown it can. the season could prove to be quite rewarding. Juniata has 6 remaining games in the MAC's and the MAC tournament at the end of the season.

The Indians will be on the road for the next 2 games, taking on Dickinson Wednesday night and then Bucknell Friday. The Indians will then return home to face California State Saturday night. Hopefully the team will continue to improve, as the team is young with no seniors on the starting 5, and may be able to add the important element of consistance to their performance from here on out.

Winter Sports Moving Ahead

by Jaime Belmont

Winter intramurals have already begun without proper recognition. There is more participation than usual this year and perhaps its a tribute to our miraculous football team.

I do not have the official standings thus far, but I have been informed of a few games that were played recently.

In men's basketball—Sweet Pea's House zapped Knight Templers 79-43; Delaware River Boys 75—Demons 60; Roguer 10 94—Cloister Crusaders 65.

Co-Rec Volleyball is moving right along, in more ways than one. David St. Clairs' Saints finally brought in a victory Sunday night, beating Slush 2-0. A perfect performance on the part of all players. St. Clair himself, who towers over the other players as well as the net at a height of 6'5", led his team with speed and ingenuity.

A few other games played Sunday included Excuse Me & Co. beating Yellow Rolls Royce 2-1; and the Later Dates over Spikes 2-0.

our ProgramReview; a college catalogue, gladly provided by the admissions office, will suffice to fill in the details. All we have to do is watch for and take advantage of ordinary opportunities that happen by: when you go home for the weekend or vacation, talk to your younger sister; tell her to tell her friends; discuss college with your friends from high school or your favorite high school teacher; write to your best buddy from the Marines; visitors from foreign countries are usually very interested. Or make the opportunities: call up some kids in your neighborhood that you suspect are thinking about college; talk to the high school guidence counselors in your area and make sure they are well informed in regards to Juniata; make arrangements with the counselors to meet with students interested in college; and etc. We don't need to do a sales pitch; just offer our information and honest assistance.

It's necessary that at least some of us put forth some conscious effort if Juniata College is to tolerate the pinch and ward off the crunch. But it's more than economics; it's our offer to share, and so perpetuate, what we value to be a good thing.

Sincerely,
Student Representative to the Commission to Plan for Juniata's Future.
Jean Pollock.

Juniata's Losing Streak In Wrestling Snapped During Susquhanna Match

by Keith Hartman

In a match just before the Christmas break, J.C.'s grapplers snapped a 16 match losing streak with an exciting 18-14 win over a tough, veteran Susquehanna University squad. Although it was the first win for the team since the 1971-72 season, prospects are looking brighter and we hope to see a few more entries in the win column this year.

Juniata scored decisions in the final three classes to overcome a five point deficit. Dave Landis, starting in his first varsity match, got the late rally going, by hanging on to defeat his opponent 3-0 via a nearfall with only 30 seconds remaining. Keith Jones preserved the win with what appeared to be a 2-2 tie. But, nearly two minutes of riding time gave Keith, and Juniata, the win.

Other winners for Juniata were: Mark Salisbury at 118, Paul Donner at 126, and Myron Zimmerman at 150.

Match results:

118—Mark Salisbury (J) decisioned Richard Edwards 12-8 via a near-fall and predicament ent. (3-0) countries are under going the same experience.

African leaders have to cope with lots of problems in trying to develop their nations. Democracy, as it is in the U.S. is probably impractical and inexpedient for some African States at the moment. Just consider all the problems you have here even with your near 100% literacy rate and nearly two hundred years experience, and you will understand. African leaders are therefore often forced to set up politically functionable forms of government through a synthesis of Democracy. Socialism and in some places Dictatorship. This is evidenced by the Military cum-Civilian regimes that are common in Africa today. It is therefore obvious that all appearances of Communist forms of government in Africa are mere, often unavoidable, episodes of the trasitional period and will change with the achievement of increased literacy rate as well as economic and political stability.

How close are the independent African states to each other?

In May 1963, a movement known as the Organisation of African Unity was founded with Dr. Nkrumah as its most articulate leader and spokesman. Dr. Nkrumah argued that only a united Africa could take up the challenges of modernization and force the world to accord it its proper status. It is true that African nations in their present divided state are too susceptible and vulnerable to the caprices of the world's powers.

The OAW still exists (all 41 independent African countries are members) and holds annual Ministerial and Presidential Conferences. So far it has been able to maintain cordial relations among member states by settling and arbitrating disputes. However, its objective of a Continental Union Government is yet to be realized. Their snail-pace approach towards unity is frustrating and leaves much to be desired. Still it is commendable that African leaders see the need for unity and are working towards it. Unity will not come easily for a United Africa and would be too much of a threat to some world powers. They will try to prevent its formation for as long as they can. Also, in the way, are hinderances such as lack of a common language and the short-sightedness of some African leaders.
